the woman to blame may be YOURSELF!

When a husband starts working late, more and more often, a wife naturally tortures herself with doubts. Actually, though, you may find the reason for his neglect right at home! Have you allowed yourself to grow careless about intimate feminine hygiene? Well, it's not too late to correct. You can be your own sweet, dainty self again so simply—so effectively—by douching with "Lysol." It's easier than ever today!

Gentler "Lysol" will not harm delicate tissues. This proved germicide, used in a douche, completely cleanses the vaginal canal—even in the presence of mucous matter. It kills germ life quickly, on contact. Yet, "Lysol" is designed for freedom from caustic or irritant action when used in feminine hygiene.

You need never again be guilty of offending—even unknowingly—if you remember that complete internal cleanliness is the way to counteract unpleasant odor. "Lysol" does this; helps keep you dainty!

Get "Lysol" today, at your drug counter. Use it in your douche. Be sure of yourself—and secure in your marriage!

Guest of honor Louella Parsons happily links arms with the Harry Ackermans, host Jim McHugh, Rosalind Russell, and Freddie Brisson, at her party.

LOUELLA PARSONS' GOOD NEWS

I've never enjoyed a party more than the beautiful "get well" garden party in my honor given by songwriter Jimmy McHugh.

I was not only feeling completely well and rarin' to go, but it had been six long weeks since I had seen many of my friends, and Jimmy thoughtfully invited over 250 to the garden of his beautiful home in Beverly Hills.

The decorations were so unique I think they deserve special mention. In place of the conventional bowls of flowers, our host had ordered pink plastic poodle dogs with wide skirts of pink net decorated with real pink rosebuds. The little dolls were so different and unique.

In the swimming pool floated large bouquets of pink, orchid and white water lilies, a beautiful background to the all-white tables, chairs and umbrellas.

Among the first to arrive was Olivia de Havilland wearing a brown taffeta cocktail dress and matching hat. Livvy seems so happy these days, so contented. She's a different girl from the repressed person she was as Mrs. Marcus Goodrich.

Ann Blyth wore a white feathered turban with a blue cocktail suit. Ann said that after years of never wearing a hat she's suddenly gone crazy about the smart, chic chapeaux of

The Gary Merrill-Bette Davis family, all present and accounted for as they disembark in New York, where Bette will soon appear in a play. The three children, Barbara, Marga and Mike, loved the airplane trip.

Bing Crosby takes time out from the shooting of his new movie, Little Boy Lost, being made in France, to chat with three of his young co-workers. This scene takes place in the Tuileries Garden in Paris.

this season so she's stocked up on them. Rosalind Russell, who ALWAYS wears a hat, came hatless wearing a white dress trimmed in green and looking as pretty and fresh as an apple blossom.

Jack Benny, just back from Europe, had much to tell us of his experiences—and when Jack tells it, everything is funny.

Jeanne Crain wore a bright green jacket over a green and white print dress and someone remarked that there's no handsomer couple in Hollywood than Jeanne and her devoted Paul Brinkman.

It was a warm afternoon, but Jane Wyman looked like a fashion plate in a violet wool dress with a deeper violet velvet jacket and chiffon scarf at the throat.

Looking like the happiest bride and groom in the world Ginny Simms never let go the arm of Bob Calhoun. And, then, just ten days later, they were SEPARATED!

Ginny refused to move into the house Bob had bought for her. Instead, she took a smaller place, moved in with her two sons by her marriage to Hyatt Dehn, and Calhoun didn't know anything about her plans until he read my "scoop" in the papers!

Break-ups in Hollywood marriages frequently come suddenly. But this one was so REAL-LY out of the blue that even one of the principals didn't know it was over.

MOST couples in love spend their time trying to escape relatives of all people!

That's why it seems so amusing to me that whenever Marilyn Monroe and the love of her life, Joe DiMaggio, get a spare moment together they hie themselves to San Francisco to visit Joe's uncles, aunts and young cousins.

As an Italian, DiMaggio is naturally a family man. And Marilyn, an orphan who has never known real family life, just loves it!

Instead of haunting the nightclubs and gay spots, Marilyn and Joe spend most of their time at Uncle Louie DiMaggio's cooking spaghetti dinners and watching shows and sports events on TV.

The DiMaggio cousins bring their teen-age girl friends home and Marilyn shows them how to make up, set their hair, do their nails, etc. Joe calls Marilyn "baby." The kids call her "doll."

One night, Marilyn and Joe hosted a party for 16 teen-agers in Chinatown feasting on chop suey, rice and tea and dancing to juke box music.

When Marilyn is with the kids she dresses just as they do—sweaters and skirts and NO publicity-type, low cut gowns, thank you.

If you ask me, one of the nicest things Joe has brought into the life of the lonely girl who is the "hottest" property in Hollywood today, is sharing his family life with her. All the fame and fortune in the world couldn't bring this happiness to Marilyn.

THE figures in the John Waynes' property settlement sound like telephone numbers. According to Mrs. Wayne's attorney, John and Chata spent $13,000 monthly during their marriage; John made $500,000 last year and he is many times a millionaire.

I've talked with John—and I know he has his dander up. This promises to be one of the most bitterly fought divorces in years.

SHELLEY Winters Gassmann is the funniest expectant mother of all time.

"I got morning sickness," quoth Shell, "and afternoon sickness, and evening sickness. I'm nauseous all the time. And the things I wanta eat! Pickles and eggs! I've always hated bananas—and now I gotta have 'em. The other day, after I'd HAD luncheon, I stopped by a drive-in and had a peanut-butter sandwich and a root-beer float.

"Before we got pregnant, Vittorio was the Hostess Joan Crawford makes sure mother-to-be Nancy Davis Reagan has everything she wants, while father-to-be Ronald Reagan looks on beamingly. Joan and William Haines, the silent screen star, gave the party for Ann Windfohr from Texas.

Guests Diana Lynn and Angela Green chat with a newspaper columnist during the party, which was held in Joan's garden. The decorations were very striking: a bright red tent covered half the garden, and red and white candles outlined the pool.

Joan gave Judy Garland, another expectant mother, a big hug when she arrived. Much later on, after most of the guests had gone home, Judy sang and sang.

one who could not sleep at night. He's the nervous type and was always pacing around thinking of his role the next day.

"Now he sleeps like he was hit over the head—and I'm the one getting up all the time. The other night I was so restless I got the car out and went for a two-hour drive—and when I came back he didn't even know I'd been gone!

"He's sweet though, bless him. He doesn't get angry with me no matter what I do. Of course, I can still start a battle, but it's one sided. He just says, 'Mama, you're upset because the bambino is coming.'

"I'll be glad when the baby is born and he'll yell back at me like he used to.

"How long does this nauseous business last, I want to know? How long will it be before I start looking like all those pretty pictures of expectant mothers in women's magazines?"

HOLLYWOOD CHIT-CHAT: The first thing Arlene Dahl did after separating from Lex Barker was to change the color scheme of the bedroom they WERE to have occupied together from beige and green to three shades of pink. . . .

Before Marilyn Morrison Ray (Mrs. Johnnie Ray) left the Chicago hospital after losing their expected baby, Johnnie showed up with a big square cut diamond to take the place of that little-bitty engagement ring so many columnists ridiculed at the time of their marriage. . . .

Ursula Thiess doesn't like Robert Taylor's mustache. You can expect it to go any time now. . . .

Dale Robertson has turned thumbs down on 20th's idea to "glamorize" his publicity, soft-pedaling his home life, for instance. "I'm a home boy and a cowhand," said Dale, "and you can't change me. There's no sense trying to get me to list the ten sexiest actresses in

TERRY MOORE IN GERMANY or LOVE IN A COLD CLIMATE

Most mothers would yell for the Life Guards if their daughter persisted in making mad love to a bare-chested fellow in the middle of an icy whirlpool. Not so Mrs. Helen Koford. She hung her Terry's clothes on the nearest hickory limb, and grabbed her Brownie. Here is her personal record of Terry and Cameron Mitchell shivering with melted snow and melting passion on location in Germany for 20th Century-Fox's Man On A Tightrope. She's added this comforting note: "Terry feels fine—the Germans certainly admire her courage." So do we, ma'am. So do we.

On the banks of the famous Isar River where the water is made of melted snow, Terry (with bathing suit under clothes) rests on Cameron.

The love scene will be shot in a whirlpool, so Terry pins up her hair before being covered with grease to help her keep warm in the water.

Terry gets greased down while a makeup man does the same for Cameron. Note in the background the Bavarian Alps of Southern Germany.

In water over their heads, Terry and Cameron play the love scene. They worked in this swift current off and on from 9:30 a.m. to 3:30 p.m.

Between takes, Pat Hening serves them hot soup from his oil burner. Terry and Cameron 10 also sat against a reflector with hot lights.

Shivering under their robes, they await the next take. Terry's mother says later it took six soopings to get the grease out of her hair.

LOUELLA PARSONS' good news

Hollywood—because I don't know who they are, or care. . . ."

No star from Broadway has so completely enchanted her co-workers in a movie as Ethel Merman making Call Me Madam. Around the 20th Century-Fox lot, they're calling Madam—doll. . . .

Nicky Hilton may be "completely over" Elizabeth Taylor—as he says. But his new honey, Sheila Connolly, is a deadringer for Liz. . . .

Fernando Lamas wants to adopt Lana Turner's little daughter, Cheryl, after he and Lana are married.

WHEN I asked Rosemary Clooney if she was going to marry Jose Ferrer she said, "Louella, I love Jose. But I don't want anyone to be hurt."

I knew she was referring to Phyllis Hill, Jose's wife, from whom he has been separated just five months. From what I have been reading about Mrs. Ferrer's dates in New York with an attractive young man, I doubt that she has any intentions of hanging onto Jose.

No young personality in years has come up as fast as Rosemary, the young singer who first attracted attention last year with her "Come On A My House" record.

When Paramount signed her for The Stars Are Singing it's no secret they thought she might be just a "one shot" star, an attraction to the jive kids who loved her records.

So what happens? Rosemary comes across with such a wallop she's now being touted as the girl to step into Betty Hutton's shoes in Paramount pictures.

I've come to know her very well during the short time she has been in Hollywood and I can tell you that she is a very honest and sincere person.

Jose Ferrer will be a lucky man when and if Rosemary says, "Yes"—and I'm sure she will.

WHEN Joan Crawford and William Haines, the decorator who used to be a silent screen star, decided to give a party for Mrs. Ann Windfohr, a Texas friend, they really did things up red and white.

Joan used her garden, covering over half of it with a bright lipstick red tent in which white and red balloons floated against the tent top. Red and white candles outlined the swimming pool, their flames flickering slightly.

There were 120 guests for dinner and dancing and without any doubt the most startling couple were Kirk Douglas and youthful, Italian beauty Pier Angeli. The sophisticated Kirk was really something to watch being very, very boyish and utterly gallant to the wide-eyed Pier who would have looked like a child in her flowing gray chiffon if the neckline had not been cut so low!

The infatigating girls, Judy Garland, Eleanor Parker and Nancy Davis Reagan were present with their respective husbands, each wearing a different type of maternity gown. Incidentally, Nancy and Ronnie Reagan held hands all evening under the table not caring whether anyone watched them or not.

It never seems to bother Ronnie and his ex-wife, Jane Wyman, when they meet at parties. They are always very cordial and seem to have much to talk about.

About four o'clock in the morning, after most of the guests had left, Judy Garland

THE HOLLYWOOD SET

By MARY MARATHON

Hi, fans! Here I am again and I'm high as a kite about a picture I've just seen—"Road to Bali" with Bing Crosby, Bob Hope and Dorothy Lamour. These three aren't exactly strangers to each other, having traveled a few previous "Roads" together. Maybe you saw one (or more) of them. If you did, you'll agree that when Bing, Bob and Dotty team up to hit the road, it's a laugh marathon for sure! In "Road to Bali" I want to tell you, they're but colossal.

* * *

What happens to them could only happen to them! They have all kinds of impossible adventures—with music—including diving for sunken treasure (a little situation Bing maneuvers Bob into); tangling with savage head hunters and beautiful native women; wrestling with ferocious animals; and running into some of your favorite Hollywood personalities (surprises galore!) in the middle of the jungle. It's all for laughs and, believe me, laughs for all. In a "Road" show anything goes, and in this one not only anything—but everything!

* * *

Dotty has a wardrobe of whistle-bait Balinese sarongs (she plays an island princess) and, of course, the two B.s buzz around her like crazy, each outdoing the other, pulling all kinds of wild wires to be the lucky one who wins her.

* * *

Story? Well, now, between you and me, anything sensible couldn't stand up under Bing's and Bob's gaff, although Dotty does her feminine best to provide motivation and maintain a semblance of sanity. There's a villain, though, who cooks up enough trouble to keep "our heroes" hopping. He's played by Murvyn Vye and I seem to remember that he connives to cheat the princess of her fortune, but who really gives a care about a story when Bing, Bob and Dotty are in action in glamorous Bali?

* * *

"Road to Bali" is the first of the "Road" films in color by Technicolor. And wait'll you see the Balinese dancers in their lush and lavish, colorful costumes. It's an eyeful you won't soon forget. There are six new songs, among them a couple of Crosby-Hope comedy routines that are worth the price of admission alone. Take it from me, fans, this "Road" rates traveling to, no matter how far you are from the theatre that plays it.

* * *

There's another Technicolor movie coming out soon, too, that I think you'll enjoy—a thriller called "The Blazing Forest," that is tops in action adventure. That gorgeous guy all the gals are gone on—John Payne—has the number one starring role as the tough boss of a logging camp in the tall timber country. Other stars in it are William Demarest, Agnes Moorehead, Richard Arlen and lovely newcomer Susan Morrow (remember I told you about her last month in connection with "The Savage"?). "The Blazing Forest" has all the action excitement its title implies, set against magnificent mountain scenery—wonderful background for the romance between Payne and Susan.

* * *

And pretty soon you'll be hearing about "Come Back, Little Sheba," the movie version of the Broadway stage hit, co-starring Burt Lancaster and Shirley Booth. Miss Booth starred in the stage play, too... but more about that simply immense picture next month. Goodbye for now, fans, and happy movie-going!

LOUELLA PARSONS' good news

(with Roger Edens playing for her) started to sing as only Judy can.

At that late hour, in such a beautiful setting, it seemed to everyone that Judy had never sounded so thrilling and her listeners were torn between tears, laughter and applause.

SPEAKING of Judy, a few days later, I ran into her shopping in Beverly Hills. It was the day I had run the "lead" story in my column about her new contract to make movies for Warner Brothers.

"Are you going to diet strenuously for your screen come-back?" I asked her.

"I'm going to diet a little, Louella," she told me. "But I'm not going to ruin my health by peeling down to the size of a banana. Look what happened to Mario Lanza. Look what happened to me before in the last stages of my MGM contract when I nearly wrecked myself striving to be a sliver."

"No ma'am," she said emphatically, "they're going to get Garland back plump and HEALTHY."

Parents of teen-age girls averse to youthful marriages can no longer point to Mitzi Gaynor and her lawyer fiancé, Richard Coyle, as wise and perfect examples of "looking before you leap."

Touted as the ideal engaged couple, Mitzi and Richard were officially engaged for three years, supposedly the happiest lovebirds in the world just waiting for her to become 21 before saying their "I do's."

So what happens? Three weeks after Mitzi reached the 21 goal line, she and Richard decided the whole thing had been a "mistake" and called off all wedding plans.

Well, it's better to find out, even after three years, that a mistake has been made than it would be AFTER wedding bells have rung out.

I can remember very well the words of my grandmother, witty, wise and humorous, when I decided to be married at 17.

"A girl of 17—and a WOMAN of 21 think very differently," she said. And this is quite as true today as it was when I was a girl, Maggie.

THE LETTER BOX: Laine Ross, Toronto, Canada, writes: "In The Merry Widow Lana Turner again proves that she is the star of stars and the loveliest lady on the screen. But I would have preferred to see Michael Wilding opposite her in place of Fernando Lamas." Lana wouldn't!!!

Dozens and dozens of letters asking, "What's the matter with Mario Lanza?" No one would like to know the answer to that more than his MGM bosses.

I am delighted to acknowledge the letter from Louis Jordan, President of The Male Teen-age Club of Detroit, consisting of 11 Negro boys and five whites. "We are great screen fans," writes Louis, "and our greatest favorite is Bette Davis—proving that teen-agers can and do admire mature actresses. We think Ava Gardner the most beautiful—and Joan Crawford the most perennial." Glad to get your opinions, Louis, although space prohibits printing all of them.

Violet Ainsworth, Memphis, opines: "Rory Calhoun is better looking and a better actor than Tony Curtis, Farley Granger, Rock Hudson, and John Derek rolled into one." Bet you start something with that crack, Violet.

That's all this month. See you next issue.

TIME TABLES:

"Missy" Stanwyck and Ralph Meeker, hottest romantic combo of the season—ma-a-a-ad for each other—and don't care who knows it! Babs got up at the unheard-of hour of 5:30 one morning recently to meet his plane from New York; she goes to the fights with him and to ice shows; and she lunches with him in the MGM commissary even though she's finished working in Jeopardy there. So don't sell this romance any shorter than the Bob Taylor-Ursula Thiess amouring!

... Gossips keep linking Terry Moore with this one and that one but mark it down in your book that there won't be anyone legally until after next April 14, when she's unhitched from Glenn Davis ... What are we columnists going to do for juicy news items after Lana Turner marries Fernando Lamas?

Liz Taylor and Mike Wilding plan calling their first-born Michael if a boy, Michelle if a girl ... The Judy Garland-Sid Luft heir will be Junior too, but Amanda if a girl ... While Lucille Ball and Desi Arnaz chose Junior for "him" and Victoria for "her" ... Strictly personal opinion: Ingrid Bergman had better make her comeback picture quick or nobody's gonna miss her! ... One timetable that's gone awry belongs to Margaret O'Brien's mother. She's dressing her teen-age daughter like the teentys-weentys Margaret O'Brien we remember at MGM—and it's the silliest thing you ever saw ... You won't recognize Marlon Brando in Julius Caesar. He speaks perfect English, not unlike Sir Laurence Olivier's impeccable English, plus which he reported scrubbed and spotless for work on the picture throughout its shooting schedule ... Will Marlon marry Movita, his steady gal? But how can he unless she gets her divorce from her estranged spouse, Jack Doyle?

SKIRMISHES OF THE MONTH:

The most bloodthirsty duel between an actor and a studio in the history of Hollywood was that staged by Mario Lanza and MGM over The Student Prince. Some of the lowdown on the battle is amusing, some is unprintable. Sidelights on the feud: Ann Blyth, hired as Mario's leading lady, sitting by quietly and with dignity throughout the wrangling; Mario stuffing himself with Italian food again, unmindful that he was regaining weight and apparently not caring; Mario's loss of $5,200 a week every time the Coca-Cola show went on the air without him—and it had to because of his MGM contract stipulating such a layoff during any suspension from the studio!

Jean Peters and Richard Widmark had to have a stand-by nurse for the first day's rehearsal on Blaze Of Glory. It was a "violent courtship" scene, as a result of which Jean suffered bruised lips, neck scratches, torn dress, loosened tooth and sprained ankle and Dick got a lump on the head, scratch over the right eye, bruised shins and a sprained rib! This is courtship?? ... Jean's, incidentally, is the role Shelley Winters bowed out of because of impending motherhood and Betty Grable bypassed because she couldn't see herself doing such fiery dramatics ... One night Evie Johnson was explaining to a reporter that every time she and Van have a quarrel he, "picks his wallet and leaves home for a double feature"; the next she and Van were out necking and holding hands at a local pub, just to help kill the nasty rumors about them ... Ginger Clayton of the Ice Follies left makeup man Frank Westmore waitin' at the church! ... Olivia DeHavilland had an argument with a still (Continued on page 81)

I am very much interested in love . . . the love a girl has for her man . . . not the phony sex-appeal for a camera, says Corinne Calvet in the eighth of MODERN SCREEN's new series on the art of living written by Hollywood's top stars

Take my word for it

by CORINNE CALVET; star columnist for December

CALVET SATIRIZES "SEX APPEAL"

First, an eighteen-inch waist . . .

. . . next, a "come-hither" glance . . .

WHEN I HAVE A PROBLEM, I take off my clothes and sit on the bed and think—like a yogi. I am thinking now, of many things, yet they are all related to one. A woman may talk about color, interior decorating, perfume, clothes, people, personality, and yet there is always involved, somehow, the subject of love. For these are the ways and things of love; of finding it, of keeping it, of enhancing it when you have it. I am going to talk about color, interior decorating, clothes, people, their personalities, and also about love directly. I am very much interested in love. So are you. So is everybody. Even those who seem to deny love are merely posing and by their various attitudes (or even by the absence of any attitude) make prevaricators of themselves. They all know that life is life only with love—otherwise it is just a process of aging.

SO, TO BEGIN, COLORS. When, for instance, I say that I feel best in red, but that green is prettiest for me, yet my husband likes me best in blue, what am I saying? The way I analyze it, I am saying that in red, which is the most bright, I feel that I will attract the most attention . . . which every woman wants; that once I have this attention, however, I know that I make the best impression in green; but that there are qualities to me which my husband visualizes most satisfactorily when I wear blue. There is more to it than that, of course. We none of us can make exact patterns of our emotional personalities, but I know I am close to the truth.

Does all this make me appear a confused person? I suppose so, but confused may not be the right word. I prefer to think I am like everyone else and that the word that best describes all of us who are human is complex. Being complex makes us hard to understand . . . even to ourselves. We all know this, but it does not stop us from trying. And we find the job of trying to make sense of ourselves very fascinating. Is there anything more fascinating? Here I will surprise you, I think. My answer will be yes. It can be even more fascinating to try to know and understand another person. Now we return to the grand passion. When you find yourself putting your whole mind and heart into this job of understanding another, and realize you are willing to spend a whole lifetime at it . . . then, cherie, that is love! Nothing less than this is love. Less than this is infatuation maybe, self-protection, self-emotional-aggrandizement often . . . but not love. Yes? No? We will see.

In Paris I studied interior decorating (There is a lady of Hollywood who has said I am not French. In that case I must have gone through the Beaux Arts and the Art Decoratif institutions in Paris in my imagination, but I can assure everyone that the diplomas I hold for graduating after a three-year course are in real parchment. And the cancelled checks with which I paid for my course are not hay, either, but real paper once quite negotiable.) When it came time to decorate my house in Hollywood, I had the benefit of this knowledge. Did I follow it? Not exactly. Instead I answered some inner instinct that women look most pretty surrounded by coral, and that was my choice, although technically I might have gone to a number of other colors. In so doing, I recognized how I could best please my feminine guests—and not disappoint the male ones! If you follow my thinking you will see we are back to love again. We won't leave it very far behind if now I take up perfume.

PERFUME HAS BEEN IMPORTANT TO ME ever since I was a young girl. No one could give me a better gift. To receive perfume was to be recognized as a woman-to-be. I still somehow feel it is sad for a woman to have to buy her own perfume (although I often do). In my life I can remember all kinds of events and happenings involving perfume. There was the time, as a schoolgirl, when I was invited to a party and took some of my mother's perfume from her dresser. I used too much and it was too potent for me—for three-quarters of an hour I walked around the block where the house party was being held, fanning at myself with my hands, to weaken the odor before I went in. There was once, when I was 14, that a boy gave me a gift of perfume which I recognized as the kind his former girl used to use and rave about. I took it, but I was angry; he was using me to recall her! I never used it when out with him, only when I was out with other boys. There are 54 bottles of perfume on my vanity today; I use them according to my moods. My husband knows this, even knows what perfumes go with what moods. There are now those evenings when I come home and I find that he has left a message for me—this or that bottle of perfume has been pulled out in front of the others! Is that not a wonderful way to tell me something? (Continued on next page)

REMARKABLE FACIAL TREATMENT

FOR 4 PROBLEMS OF "YOUNG SKIN"

So often the oil glands of "young skin" suddenly become overactive. At the same time, the skin turns sluggish. It fails to throw off the daily accumulation of dead skin cells. Day by day, these tiny dead flakes build up into a layer over the pore openings. Then—there's trouble ahead. Enlarged pores and even blackheads are on the way.

Now—the makers of famous Pond's Creams recommend a special treatment for these four major problems: oiliness, sluggishness, enlarged pores and blackheads. It takes only one minute—and it works!

Restyle
your complexion!
Make it clearer, brighter, softer!

Cover your face, except eyes, with a cool, snowy 1-Minute Mask of Pond's Vanishing Cream. Leave the greaseless Mask on one full minute. The Cream's "keratolytic" action loosens stubborn, clinging, dead skin cells. Actually dissolves them off! Frees the tiny openings of your skin glands so they can function normally again. Now—after just 60 seconds—tissue off clean. See how tingling fresh your skin feels! How much smoother, brighter, and clearer it looks!

Don't "stifle" your skin under a heavy make-up! A light greaseless powder base of Pond's Vanishing Cream is sheer flattery!

I will never forget how I used to stand in front of the windows of the perfumeries in Paris. To me, the perfumes thus displayed were the symbol of feminine enrichment. Those little bottles said to me, "Oh! This can be a wonderful life!" I loved them all. Maybe that is why I never then, or even now, could be content with one perfume. Then I used to change perfumes with each beau. Now I change with each mood with the same beau. Maybe in this way I am giving up the possibility of having my husband reminded of me every time he smells a certain perfume. All right then, I just have to be sure that I give him more than just the aroma of my perfume to remember me by! No, for me not one perfume, but lots. And when we had that earthquake in California last summer, I jumped out of bed and ran to the dresser to try and put my arms around every jiggling bottle! (Do you want to know a trick with perfumed bath oil? Rub it all over after the bath. In 15 minutes the odor disappears, as the oil is absorbed into your pores. But later, when you go out, when you are dancing, when you get warm, the oil is activated again and the perfume comes out and is detectable again. Which is a good time for it, no?)

I LOVE CLOTHES. But maybe I have to say that I make a study of the clothes . . . not the price tags. By this I don't mean the price tags are not to be considered. I mean that a big price does not to me indicate that a dress is wonderful. I have gone to parties and hostesses have said to me, "What a charming gown! Where did you get it?" And many times my answer has been "Ohrbach's," or "Junior Saks," or even "Penny's." Not the dress just as it came off the rack, but after I decorated it or, sometimes, undecorated it. When it comes to $400 dresses I cannot tell you much about them. I can say this, that very often the designer of such a dress sets out to please himself and maintain his reputation for the unusual, but what he finishes up with is not always good for the woman.

To me a woman is her clothes, or should be, in a way. For instance, in Powder River, my latest picture, I play a gambling woman of the early West who carries a small gun. I wear beautiful gowns adorned with the big bustles of that period. When the scene was ready to be filmed, I found out I was supposed to carry my gun in a little pocket on the front of the dress, where it is smooth and tight against the body. I told the director I did not think any woman would do this . . . such an unsightly bulge. So they tried to think of other places to put it . . . from my hair to my bosom. I objected; none of these seemed right to me. Then I thought to myself, "Where would I wear a gun if I was such a woman in such a dress?"—and I knew right away. In the bustle, of course! There we sewed a little pocket and that was the place. Voila! Le Derringer Derriere!

WHAT IS THE MOST IMPORTANT THING IN LOVE? I asked myself one day (and a thousand before that!). The answer is . . . to be loved for yourself, of course. This is why it is so important not to be a poser . . . you endanger, you practically make impossible, the chance of being loved for yourself. From this, curiously enough, I get the reason why I both feel sorry for a snob and dislike her as well.

I am sorry because she is hurting herself, and since I can't go round all day feeling sorry I gradually get to dislike her for being such a stupid nuisance. Wherever you go, people are hungry for real, not artificial, people.

I love my husband for his faults. I can appreciate his good qualities, but his faults make up the color of his personality. Sometimes he is a victim of his faults, sometimes he conquers them. I sympathize or I applaud—with my love. I hope he loves me for my faults. If he does he must love me very much because I have many. Isn't it true that often a very best friend may be someone who didn't like you to start with?

A YOUNG GIRL CANNOT RUSH LOVE. It must come by itself. This makes for great difficulty. It means she is going to be lonely till it comes to her, but it cannot be helped.

Who dwells most on love, to whom is it a more important phase of life, the young girl yearning for it or the wife who has it? Most people would say the former, I think. But I am sure this is not so. It is when a girl gets married that love can be seen in its true proportion to happiness. Now she must keep it.

How? Of all the answers to this, there is one which overshadows the rest. We go back to what I mentioned in the beginning of this column. To be married is to have a fantastically interesting opportunity of knowing another life as well or even better than your own. If you do not take advantage of this opportunity you are playing a game, not living a love, and your marriage will fail, I think.

THE PHILOSOPHER STUDIES his fellow-men and by so doing, no matter what his findings are, is paying them a compliment; he is showing they are worthy of his deepest and most profound thoughts. The least, the very least, any wife can do for her mate (and for herself) is to devote her fullest interest to him. And he to her, of course.

No married friend of mine has ever gotten sympathy from me with a complaint that she was bored. Bored? Listen . . . there is so much to any human heart that it is impossible to get bored trying to know it. There is so much . . . not only that you don't know about, but that he doesn't know about! And in the very trying to learn it, a hundred dissatisfactions in the marital relationship will either adjust themselves or become less fearsome.

Bored? Listen! In the life of any person alive today, and most certainly in the life of your mate, there is a greater, more absorbing story than any yet written—if only there existed a novelist skilled enough to write it. Every writer, every editor, every publisher knows this. Neither will you be skilled enough to write it. But there is nothing to stop you from reading it . . . in the heart and the soul and the ways of the one you love!

Atomic scientist (Roy Milland) receives instructions from enemy agent (Martin Gobel) as he enters his guarded Government laboratory.

He microfilms records of his own work secrets, and of fellow scientists; starts them on their way to Russia.

By accident the FBI uncovers the theft. They are hot on Milland's trail as the spy ring engineers his escape from Washington and the U.S.

He meets mysterious Rito Gam in a New York tenement; and near death atop the Empire State building.

THE THIEF

This is the story of a traitor, a trusted and respected atomic scientist (Ray Milland) who operates out of Washington's cloistered government laboratories as finger man for the Communist spies. The story is starkly simple: You watch the spies in action from the delivery of orders to Milland, through his microfilming of the secret data, watch it as it passes through a chain of agents until the final courier takes off by trans-Atlantic plane. Suddenly the fantastic precision is broken when one of the links falls into police hands, and the FBI goes into action. Up to this point the plot roughly parallels the case of Britain's Klaus Fuchs, but to say that this is a story out of today's headlines would be trite understatement, because The Thief goes far beyond the headlines into the mind of the traitor himself, his split loyalties, his growing doubts, his shame and naked fear. As a thriller, this Harry M. Popkin production is unsurpassed. The undiminished tension builds from the first scene through the spine-tingling chase across the wind-whipped parapets of the Empire State tower. You know by this time that the screenplay by Clarence Green and Russell Rouse has no dialogue, no talking. The sound track is otherwise normal with a fine musical score. Occasionally you may feel that the muteness is forced (street noises should include the hum of voices) but on the whole you'll never miss the conversation. Milland handles his very difficult role with Academy-award perfection, and Martin Gabel is superb as the Communist contact man. Rita Gam, a very seductive young lady plays a very seductive young lady in a way you'll never forget. The Thief is a great achievement as well as an important milestone in motion picture making. You won't want to miss it. Released through United Artists.

EVERYTHING I HAVE IS YOURS

Marge and Gower Champion, that charming and up-and-coming dancing team, are starred for the first time in Everything I Have Is Yours, but the film is hardly likely to advance their screen careers. For to tell the truth the picture contains almost everything in the way of a backstage plot except any originality, and the Champions are hard put to make the people they play into much more than another bickering stage pair. They are cast as a young couple about to make their Broadway debuts in a new musical. After the curtain has come down and they have scored a resounding success, Marge faints and Gower gets a resounding shock. It seems he is about to become a father. So Marge retires to have her baby, and her husband goes on to continuing stage acclaim. Gower feels that Marge should stay home and mind the baby; she does so but minds even more the attention he gets from his new partner, Monica Lewis. The story is neither much more complicated nor any more interesting than it sounds. To string it out, there are some dances that are nicely executed by the Champions, and some songs. The Champions give their all but that's not enough to save Everything I Have Is Yours from being something of a bore.

Cast: Marge and Gower Champion, Dennis O'Keefe, Monica Lewis.—MGM.

THE TURNING POINT

Best by far of the many melodramas inspired by the Kefauver hearings, The Turning Point owes its success more to a slick screenplay direction, performances and over-all production than to its over-pat plot. At that, the story is never dishonest or downright unlikely; it's just that it compresses too much into a single film, so that even if possible it does seem a little improbable. Yet even its main point of improbability gains strength by the very tragedy of it. A crime prosecutor is appointed who doesn't know his beloved father is a dishonest cop. The prosecutor and his father, impressively played by Edmond O'Brien and Tom Tully, are a team tracking down the corrupt "syndicate" controlling the largest city in a major state. The father, basically not a very bad man, is forced to pay the penalty for his past weaknesses and keep the mob informed of his son's operations. Reporter William Holden learns this and finds himself in a difficult spot, for the prosecutor's family are among his best friends and he has fallen in love with Alexis Smith, O'Brien's socialite aide. How this story is resolved may be more lurid than likely, and yet almost every single action has had its counterpart in real life. It's a pleasure, too, to note such adult direction and performances.

Cast: William Holden, Edmond O'Brien, Alexis Smith, Tom Tully.—Paramount.

BECAUSE YOU'RE MINE

This motion-picture examination of Mario Lanza is really something for his fans. It features him in military uniform and in mufti; in operatic arias and popular tunes; in comedy, roughhouse and romance. There's no question about it being a vehicle. It is, and Mario comes off pretty well, considering. Tailored as closely to his talents as the un-G.I. uniforms he wears, it tells what at first seems to be a stale story about an opera star who is drafted. But then there's a definite twist. Tough barracks sergeant James Whitmore is a Lanza fan, and what's more, he sings himself. In addition he plays long-hair records, makes Lanza (Continued on page 22) sing for him and insists that the other men wait on both of them. This is funny. It's in the cards that Whitmore has a singing sister for whom he has ambitions. This is not so funny, for it means that Lanza must become infatuated with her and the screenwriters must return to more time-honored routines. Luckily the sister is Doretta Morrow, from Broadway and The King And I, who must have been as much of a treat for the cameramen as she was for the sound engineers.

Cast: Mario Lanza, Doretta Morrow, James Whitmore.—MGM.

THE SNOWS OF KILIMINJARO

Ernest Hemingway's famous short story called "The Snows Of Kiliminjaro," a modern classic, is a fable pointing to man's primary purpose as the seeking of the unobtainable. The movie of the same name, although billed as by Hemingway, owes little to his plot and less to his theme. A successful pot-boiling author (Gregory Peck) is first shown dying of blood-poisoning on the African veldt below Kiliminjaro, awaiting the arrival of a rescue party while his wealthy wife (Susan Hayward) does her best to get him well.

In flashback form, he recalls his past. These memories contain some stunning scenes, some stunning women (Ava Gardner, Helene Stanley, Ava Norring, Hildegard Neff). But none of them make much sense or helps explain what makes him tick. Now and then there is reference to his literary output, of which he is ashamed. But the man's failure, if any, is so obviously an interior, extra-personal one, that the montage-like flashbacks are unable to show it. Considering what the screenwriter has done to Hemingway's meaning, there is little left to show. Cast: Gregory Peck, Susan Hayward, Ava Gardner.—20th Century-Fox.

MONKEY BUSINESS

The sometimes fumbling hands of human film-writers are all too evident in this motion-picture essay on monkeyshines. As so often happens in movie farce, the original funny idea seemed too hauntingly humorous to let go of, and there's not much left to laugh about by the time the curtain comes down. But the basic premise is amusing enough to start things off hilariously. It concerns a young-to-middle-aged research worker (Cary Grant) who thinks he has discovered the secret of eternal youth. The audience knows that actually the elixir has been discovered, but in the dead of night and by mistake, by a chimpanzee who escapes from his cage, pours a mixture out with scientific casualness and empties it into, a water-cooler. Later, the gimmick has it, Grant's own concoction proves so sour that various characters have to take to the water-cooler to cool down. Naturally, they un-age. First, of course, is Grant himself, who gets himself a crew-cut, a racing car, a youthful lingo and asks Marilyn Monroe out on a date. This isn't appreciated by wife Ginger Rogers, who proceeds to pour herself a double shot (and has to take a double drink from the cooling machine). The fun by this time has stopped multiplying itself accordingly; rather the reverse. What was funny to start, gets simply dull at the end. Monkey Business would have been a lot better if it had some sharp satiric point. Cast: Cary Grant, Ginger Rogers, Marilyn Monroe, Charles Coburn.—20th Century-Fox.

THE LUSTY MEN

Out of the bravery, brutality, cowardice and constant danger of the rodeo ring, Jerry Wald and Norman Krasna have made a fine film. The men of the title are simple individuals, as human beings go; but their motives, like all men's, are complicated ones that push them on, often against their better judgment. Jeff McCloud (Robert Mitchum), one-time national rodeo champion, has reached the end of the glory trail. He has retired from rodeo life until ambitious young Wes Merritt (Arthur Kennedy) persuades him to turn tutor so that Wes can follow in his footsteps, giving Jeff half the take. Wes' wife (Susan Hayward) fights both Jeff and the scheme, for she values her security even more than her man. The prize money, however, is a lure that is hard to resist, so the trio are soon riding the rodeo trail with Wes winning a name for himself wherever they go. When the success and money begin to be more than Wes can handle, their luck leaves; and the story reaches a logical climax. The lusty life and sudden death of rodeos provide the primary elements and the triangle tale told here is often profound in its simplicity. People talk in sentences that are realistically down-to-earth, and there is therefore sometimes a kind of earthy poetry about them. In few movies have Western scenes been so movingly photographed in all their stark and barren beauty. This is not a perfect picture, but it so often comes close to art that all its makers must be credited with the kind of creative imagination that all too seldom comes from Hollywood.

Cast: Robert Mitchum, Susan Hayward, Arthur Kennedy.—RKO.

LIMELIGHT

Not a comedy but the story of a comedian, Limelight serves as a fitting climax to the career of the screen's great Charles Chaplin. The film is both autobiographical (it contains several allusions to his personal life) and generalized enough to serve as an autobiography for all clowns. Limelight is not about a Little Tramp, but about a great British music-hall performer named Calvero who plays similar parts. Calvero's one purpose in life—to make people laugh—is disappearing as the applause of his audiences declines. With the help of drink, he is dying inside. Then he gains a reprieve from time. He saves a suicide-bent young ballerina (Claire Bloom) and sets her on the road to personal happiness and public acclaim. If there is any symbolism meant, it is that when an old entertainer manages to divest himself of self-centeredness, and passes on the privileges of an artist, he regains his soul. But Limelight is neither an illustrated lecture nor a mawkish backstage story. It can be looked at from many levels and seen many times. It is thoroughly worth seeing, for example, for any one of Chaplin's "acts" or sketches, executed in the old music-hall tradition. One particular masterly sequence is a routine that teams Chaplin with deadpan comic Buster Keaton in an old-time pantomime bit. Limelight is thoroughly worth seeing, too, for Claire Bloom; for its ballet (performed by Melissa Hayden and André Eglevsky of the N. Y. City troupe) and for Chaplin's melodic and memorable score. Most of all it is worth seeing for a rich performance by Chaplin himself in a role that calls upon all his resources.

Cast: Charles Chaplin, Claire Bloom, Buster Keaton, Sydney Chaplin, Nigel Bruce.—United Artists.

AMERICAN IN LONDON

An eye-witness account from Europe of Hollywood's triple-threat man in action, as Gene Kelly prepares to outdo himself in London

BY BEVERLY LINET

■ It's come at last! The Americans have invaded London. They've stormed Grosvenor Square, set up camp, and from all reports the head of the outfit is planning a revolutionary movement to startle the world.

What's more the British, bless their rolled-umbrellas and bowler hats, are helping them. They're conspiring like mad to keep the Kellys here as long as possible. They've shined up the Tower of London for young Kerry; leased the prettiest house in the Mews to Betsy; and are keeping strictly out of Gene's hair. All Mr. Kelly wants is to be left alone with his wonderful Invitation To The Dance.

This "hooper's dream," as he calls it, is a really fantastic project. It will be a technicolored spectacle consisting of four ballet stories danced to four totally different musical moods. The plans have been two years and three continents in the dreaming. Film is rolling through the cameras, but the entire picture is not even yet planned. Kelly claims he is still working "off the cuff." In fact, impressed but incredulous visitors to the set report, "He is actually making it up as he goes along!"

Far from being haphazard or careless, this daily improvisation is carefully maintained to keep to the spirit of the project. It is an exciting new idea. There will be no dialogue . . . no continuation of story. Each narrative ballet follows a rough plot outline, but the actual performance is dictated only by great dancers' responses to great musical inspiration.

The first ballet concerns the circus. Kelly dances a clown hopelessly in love with a beautiful tightrope walker. He meets his death (Continued on page 58)

Gene's so busy with his new movie, Invitation To The Dance, he doesn't have much time for relaxing. He's a real family man though, and loves to romp with daughter Kerry, and his young nephew.

Rose Point sterling in the mood of romance

A legend of love in silver—Wallace's Rose Point!

It was inspired by the wedding veil of queens, the legendary Rose Point Lace. Centuries ago, a Venetian nobleman found in his gardens a full-blown rose, enshrined in a delicately spun web. He challenged his finest lace-makers to duplicate it and Rose Point Lace was born—a wedding veil for his bride.

In Wallace's Rose Point the full-blown rose, surrounded by silver pearls is sculptured in sterling by famed William S. Warren in exclusive "Third Dimension Beauty." Like every Wallace "Third Dimension Beauty" pattern it is a masterpiece—beautifully formed not only in front, but in profile and back—giving you sterling perfection from every possible view.

Six piece place setting, Rose Point, $32.50.
Settings of other patterns from $32.50 to $43.50—all prices include Federal Tax.

Read the exciting design stories of each Wallace pattern in the 32-page book "Treasures in Sterling." It also contains many helpful table-setting ideas. Write (send 10c to cover postage) to Wallace Silversmiths, Department 99, Wallingford, Conn.

Paintings by your favorite stars now on Hallmark Christmas Cards

They're all in the Hallmark Hollywood Star Box

Painting is a hobby with these stars. Groucho Marx sketches between rehearsals at the studio. Fred MacMurray likes to get up early in the morning and paint before breakfast. Jane Wyman finds paint brushes, oils and canvas the perfect companions between pictures. And Henry Fonda went to art school long before he became an actor.

Hallmark Cards asked each one of these stars to design a Christmas card they would like to receive—and the Hollywood Star Box is the result.

There are twelve Christmas cards in the Hollywood Star Box, three reproductions of each of the paintings by the four stars. Groucho paints an amusing candy-cane house; Fred, a winter landscape; Jane and Henry...well, why don't you see for yourself how the stars paint?

You'll find the Hollywood Star Box for $1.00 at all the fine stores that feature Hallmark Cards. It's only one of many, many exclusive Hallmark styles you can buy in boxes. And there are lots of Hallmark boxes priced as low as 59 cents. So, no matter what limits your budget may have, your Christmas cards can have Hallmark on the back...the famous Hallmark that tells your friends, "You cared enough to send the very best"!

what REALLY happened to MARIO LANZA!

BY JAMES CARR

■ They are saying in Hollywood that Mario Lanza is through, finished, washed-up. They are saying that even should he make a last-minute peace with MGM and agree to star in The Student Prince, an almost impossible possibility at this point—the motion picture industry wants nothing to do with him.

The problem child who once told reporters, "I'm a big baby, all singers are big babies; Caruso was a big baby, too," has not only earned the animosity of studio executives, but the hundreds of extras, supporting players, and musicians who found themselves dependent upon Mario's talent. They now regard him as a villain, a heavy, an irresponsible playboy, "a guy who has rocks in his head." As one studio official pithily put it, "the most unreasonable star I have encountered in the last 35 years—this guy should go to a good psychiatrist and get straightened out."

What is wrong with Mario Lanza? Why did he refuse to star in The Student Prince? Why does he refuse to give his side of the argument? Why is he willing to become the target for industry hatred? What's happening to him, anyway?

These are a few of the questions millions of his fans want answered. Explanations by the gossip columnists are inadequate and untrue, because Mario has refused to talk to them.

Hedda Hopper, for example, who shared in his discovery and helped bring him to the attention of the Hollywood bigs, tried to get Mario on the phone and print his side of the well-publicized dispute. Mario, who loves Hedda, declined to talk to her. Instead he sent her a couple of dozen roses and a card which said, "Will see you soon."

LANA AND LOVE

Lana made her first movie 15 years ago for Warners. Today she's starred in MGM's The Merry Widow

For 15 years she's loved lavishly and taken heartbreak with a smile. In this intimate story Lana reveals what she's learned and what she's going to do about it.

BY JIM HENACHAN

■ Lana Turner sat in a row boat and stared silently across the lake into the thick growth of trees that covered the distant bank. The water chopped busily, agitated by a playful wind, but the swell was gentle and the boat swayed easily in a restful, sedative motion. Lana leaned back, her hands flat on the seat behind her, and stretched her spine in a luxurious, cat-like movement and she looked into the sky where fat white clouds sat content against a field of bright blue. The oars rested in the water, slapping gently at the chop and creaking quietly in the oar locks. It was a day and a place for dreaming and remembering; the occasional chill in the autumn air, telling of summer's last days, was stimulating, and the whip of the wind in her hair seemed to spark thoughts in Lana Turner's mind.

This day was truly a day for meditation and for the (Continued on page 75)

The big news about Shelley isn't that she's going to how it's made a new person

BY LOUIS POLLOCK

SHELLEY'S GREATEST SECRET

■ Petty annoyances which before would have caused Shelley Winters to blow up and turn over applecarts all around town now find her almost mystically remote. A promised picture role withdrawn? A new apartment all awry and life gone hectic? Somebody daring to take her name in vain and spreading invidious and baseless rumors? It doesn't touch her. Under her blonde, tousled poodle cut is a mind occupied with other matters, mainly those related to the great event before her—the expected birth of her son. A son? She knows it's going to be a son? Oh, sure. She committed herself on that point to her husband, Vittorio Gassmann, right from the first.

"Will it be a boy?" he practically ordered when the doctor gave her the news and a columnist phoned him about it before she had even reached home again.

"Absolutely," she told him.

In the third month of her pregnancy, about the time she moved into the new duplex apartment building she and Vittorio bought, she still had few doubts. Talking to some friends (an executive from the studio, a writer, workmen installing a gas outlet in the fireplace, numerous callers and various deliverymen—but all friends) she did admit an outside chance of error. But only for a fleeting moment.

"A girl?" she commented. "Well, if it's a girl, she'll be beautiful. But I'm certain it will be a boy. Shelley Winters, mother of a U. S. president. Imagine! Pretty good, eh? Of course he may have some competition. Elizabeth Taylor's baby will be born three (Continued on page 89)

After Tony started practicing for his Houdini role, Janet did nothing but pick up decks of cards and help him out of strait-jackets.

...AND EVERYTHING GOES CRAZY!

Tony and Janet's antics keep everybody talking . . . and guessing. Don't let their loud screams of discord fool you. These two are just looney with love

BY JACK WADE

■ One sunny autumn afternoon, Tony Curtis was stretched out on the living-room floor of his Wilshire Boulevard apartment clad only in shorts and a strait-jacket. As he puffed a cigarette held in one set of toes, and raked his curls with a comb clamped in the other—practicing up for his magician role in Houdini—his honey-haired wife, Janet Leigh, looked on with undisguised admiration, not unmixed with awe. She was pouring a glass of water down her husband's parched throat and mopping his beaded brow when a rap summoned her to the door.

"Good day, Madame!" began a beaming salesman. "You look like an intelligent young housewife. But in your humdrum duties are you keeping up with the world? Are you thinking sanely? Are you informed? I have here," he stated, "a sensational magazine subscription offer—three for the price of one. Now, if you will permit me—"

At that point in the pitch, Tony struggled to his feet, still manacled and bound, and staggered toward the door, wearing a wild look, half feigned and half natural. "Excuse me, please," said Janet.

"Now, Tony," she soothed, "it's all right. This isn't the nice man, but he's coming for you very soon, dear. It won't hurt when they take you away. Why, you'll love it there! And I'll come see you every day and bring you a cake!"

She turned back to the peddler who was already edging away. "I don't think," said Janet sadly, "that we'll (Continued on page 69)

what's the trouble, esther?

Esther and Ben have been married seven years, have two sons. Still pessimists cry, "Split-up."

■ On Tuesday, November 25th of this year, Esther Williams will celebrate her seventh year of marriage to Ben Gage.

This means she will rise at 6:00 A.M., take a plunge in her heated pool at 6:15, feed the children if they're awake at 6:30, arrive at the studio by 7:00, appear on the set by 8:00, work eight or nine hours, then rush home to spend a few minutes with her Benjie and Kimmy before they're put to bed.

Should Esther and Ben decide to live it up a little and celebrate their anniversary, say by going to the Mocambo or dancing at Ciro's—incidentally, this spectacularly tall couple dance very well together which isn't too true of most Hollywood couples—you can bet even money that on the following morning at least one gossip column will carry an item to the effect that Esther's seventh wedding anniversary will probably be her last with Ben Gage.

Every year for seven years now, the columnists have been predicting—and here is a direct quotation—that "This is one marriage that can't last."

A few weeks ago, for example, a syndicated columnist who happens to be a close friend of the Gages and is usually careful about printing break-up rumors, told his readers that the domestic bickering between Esther and Ben had reached the boiling point.

When Esther was asked to comment on the item, she merely shrugged those broad, well-muscled shoulders of hers, (Continued on page 91)

Barbara Stanwyck's dealt herself a

■ There was a time, not too many years ago, when every movie magazine photographer in Hollywood knew exactly where to go on Friday nights.

There was only one place—The Hollywood Legion Stadium. Each Friday at about 9:00 P.M. the stars would begin to arrive—Barbara Stanwyck with her then-

The muted color scheme in the living room was stolen directly from the foliage surrounding the house. The grey-green rug is the color of oak leaves, the red chair is a bright geranium shade. Furniture is English traditional.

Gene had only one request. He wanted to be able to stand in the center of the house and see all the downstairs rooms. The architect said he'd do it, and he did. This is the central spot.

The only Western decor in the Autry home is a three-dimensional mural in the butternut-paneled library. Created by artist Andy Anderson, it's a comic study of cowhands betting on who lasts longest on a bucking bronc.

Most of the Autrys' furniture, including the bed in their master bedroom, was designed especially for them. Their bedroom doubles as an upstairs parlor; the windows open on a balcony.

■ "Don't you trouble yourself anymore, young lady. I think I'll take my own plane."

The warm, soft voice spoke good-naturedly, but the little redhead at the telephone desk of American Airlines was far from soothed.

"How do you like that, Mildred!" she sputtered to the girl beside her. "Here I am knocking myself out, trying to get Gene Autry one seat to Houston and he tells me to skip it. He'll fly his own plane."

Mildred grinned. "That's what a cowboy's gotta do nowadays to compete with the Space Patrolters."

She may be right as far as some cowboys are concerned. But Gene's explanation is quite different, and thoroughly Autry.

"Frankly speaking," he says, "I don't know what I'd do without my (Continued on next page) plane. I'm a small-town boy myself (born in Tioga, Texas and raised in Ravia, Oklahoma) and I can't resist playing rural communities where hardly any of the big stars ever drop in. The plane gets me there, and it gets me back home. Lots more often, too."

When Gene mentions home, a soft, small grin forms on his lips and his blue eyes light up. To him home means being with his wife Ina and having a few friends in for a barbecue in North Hollywood. It's as simple as that.

Ten years ago home was a Toluca Lake showplace. When it burned down in 1941 Gene joined the Air Force, and Ina camped out on their "Melody Ranch" in San Fernando.

Three years ago, Gene and his wife decided to build another "in town" house to replace the old one. By this time the Autry coffers were pretty well filled with loot so that the singing cowboy and his wife could have bought or built practically any kind of home they wanted.

This is a pretty enviable position to occupy. Put yourself in it for one dreamy, ecstatic moment. Suppose you had one or two or three million dollars. What sort of house would you get for yourself? Would you buy or would you build? Would you choose something modern or something traditional? Would you want an estate or just a home?

This is what the Autrys did. Sensible by nature they bought four acres in a wooded canyon, quiet and country-like, but very near the studios. Then they waited for the restrictions on home construction to lift. During this interval they thought out every detail of their post-war house. When it came to the actual task of transmitting ideas to blueprints, Mrs. Autry was able to tell her architect, her contractor, and her decorator exactly what she and Gene wanted.

A typical husband, Gene says, "I left all that to Ina. After all, I knew she'd live in the house more than I would."

Ina says, "I didn't go on tour with Gene that season, because it took one whole year to get our house finished. It was quite a job but I loved every minute of it."

the men in my life

I don't know why it is, but as soon as time takes a girl out of her teens and into her 20's, people begin wondering why she doesn't get married. I won't be 21 until January, yet, already people are looking at the naked third finger of my left hand and leering ever so slightly.

I wish they'd give me time. I want to get married some day, sure. When I was little I had plush daydreams about growing up and falling in love and walking down the aisle. But it isn't quite that simple, I find. I have a supreme advantage in that I like men. I like them, as a rule, much better than women. I think they're more interesting and that they play the game more fairly. But that doesn't mean it's easy to find somebody I like who also likes me. It's usually been the case that when I set eyes on some tall and likely-looking male specimen, he either looked the other way or stepped on my foot and didn't bother to apologize. I guess you could sum the whole thing up that way; either he couldn't see me for dust, or if he could, he turned out (Continued on page 72)

by elyda nelson marilyn's ex-sister-in-law

■ Probably at no time in the history of movies have so many men been in love with one woman. Soldiers, sailors, marines, Hollywood executives, not to speak of baseball players! And, while Marilyn Monroe is still single (if she still is at this reading), any one of them may by some miraculous chance become her future husband.

But no matter what man marries Marilyn, he will be haunted by the first and perhaps greatest love of her life. It may be at the hour just before dawn as Marilyn stirs restlessly in her sleep, her thoughts completely ruled by her subconscious. Suddenly she may sit bolt upright in bed, and her husband, abruptly wakened from deep sleep, will ask, "Sweetheart—what's the trouble?"

These pictures chronicle the unhappy story of Marilyn Monroe's first romance. They come from the family scrapbook of a woman who knew her intimately, Elyda Nelson, the sister of the man Marilyn met, married and left behind long ago.

1 This is how Marilyn looked at 14, the first time her husband, Jim Dougherty, met her. He fell for her right away.

2 They married two years later; Jim was 21, Marilyn not quite 16. She wouldn't accept the engagement ring he selected, insisted on a less expensive one. Although her mother couldn't attend, several of her "foster mothers" were present.

3 There was no time for a wedding trip, but, a year later, Jim enlisted in the service, was sent to Cofa lina. They loved it there, called it a honeymoon.

8 Modeling for ads, magazine covers, like this one, took a lot of time. Jim didn't mind until it began interfering with his seeing her. The split came so

Jim was a simple man, content to lead the useful, but obscure life of a policeman. Marilyn wasn't made for domesticity . . . a dazzling career was her goal. Her success is a legend, now, but does she have what she really wants, at last?

4 Marilyn shared this first letter, and the ones that followed, with Jim's mother, after her husband was shipped overseas.

5 "To the most wonderful hubby in the whole wide world, love, Norma Jeane," was how Marilyn inscribed this picture she had taken to send to him.

A policeman's life appealed to Jim (left), who joined the force when he got out of service, but Marilyn longed for a career.

10 After they were divorced in 1946, Marilyn continued modeling. Fashion shots like this led to movie nibbles. Her first part was in Scudda Hoo, Scudda

HAPPY TALK

Doris Day keeps talking that happy talk of hers and mak-

Hollywood just sits and marvels at its best-adjusted actress

BY STEVE CRONIN

Years of dance band traveling and being on her own made Doris self-reliant. She can still take care of herself, but now has manager-hubby Marty Melcher's help.

He approves her "buys" as he approves most everything his girl does. They married after a casual courtship in May, 1951.

Two of Hollywood's least complicated people become very much a pair when doing something important to both of them, like hunting antiques.

Whether they're buying furniture or selecting drapes, Doris and Marty work hard and have fun doing it—together.

■ During the recent shooting of one of the big Doris Day musicals at Warner Brothers' Studio, some out-of-town visitors dropped in on the set. It was in the middle of a very complicated musical number in which Doris and a couple of the other principals were required to interrupt their singing and dancing to put across a plot point. This is at best a harrowing procedure, for it involves cues for the actors, cameramen and technicians that must be hit right on the button. The timing, in other words, must be exact to the finest degree.

Nobody ever shoots a scene like this right the first time. As a matter of fact, 10 or 20 times is sometimes required before the scene is satisfactory to both the director and the cameraman. This shot, however, was a real toughie and it was shot again and again and again. As the hours wore on the visitors sat and waited, just, maybe, to see what would finally happen. The director was a nervous wreck. The leading man looked like a lunatic wanting to burst from his cage. The photographer seemed about to go right through the roof at any moment. But Doris Day just smiled and tried again every time she was asked to. She did each take with a smile, the same sort of smile she wore the first time. Finally one of the visitors turned to their guide.

"What's the matter with her?" he asked. "Hasn't she got any nerves? Doesn't she ever explode?"

The guide looked puzzled for a moment. "No," he said. "I guess she doesn't. Say, that's kind of funny."

You're doggone right it's kind of funny. It's just about as odd as a star working for nothing. It's something that has seldom been seen on a sound stage before. But it is no miracle. It is just that Doris Day is happy. She's found a peace, an ability to live with herself and others that is superior. There are those who say she has found religion, but that is only part of it. She has learned the secret of patience, and it is one of the main reasons why she is a star today. It is one of the main reasons she will go on and on while other stars fall or become victims of bad habits, greed and self-adulation.

It was a gradual process. When Doris Day first came to the movies she was as anxious as most newcomers who break into pictures are. She had been a band singer for years. A girl who had made a living by moving from one town to another every day of the year. A girl who had dressed in washrooms, slept for weeks in the back seat of a bus, and who had to get before a milling throng of strangers at each stop and sing warmly about love, or whip herself into a tizzie with a jump song she'd sung a thousand times. In other words, she was a fake by profession. A performer, but never actually in the mood she pretended to be.

When she first came to Hollywood, Doris was pretty bitter about life. She was married to a young fellow who was a musician with one of the bands she had sung with and they were broke. Instead of staying at a swank hotel, as most performers dream (Continued on page 84)

Return to Faith

by David Wayne

The Wayne children, twins Melinda and Susan, and son Timothy, are being brought up to think religion, as well as just feel it.

No one preached faith to me. It just came. I found it part of love, when love came to me

■ When I was seven and the minister of our Baptist Church in Bloomingdale, Michigan, thundered forth the phrase, "And the fiery wrath of God shall descend upon you!" I misunderstood him. I had never heard the word "wrath" until this Sunday morning. I thought he had said, "And the fiery raft of God shall descend upon you!"

I knew what a raft was. And I had a sneaking suspicion that I must be a sinner. All the shuddering way home I could see those flaming logs falling on me.

What made it worse was that up to that time I did not picture man as in God's image; the best I could do was picture God as in man's image. The man I felt He must most look like was my grandfather David McMeeking—a towering patriarch with a long, flowing, white beard. Grandfather was to me all-powerful. He could swing me high aloft with one arm. He would also give me dimes and pat my head. I loved him . . . why would he want to throw burning logs on me? It dismayed me and perplexed him because I (Continued on next page) stayed away from him for days. Finally I came to the conclusion that he would never think of doing such a terrible thing. There was only one other answer. The minister must have been telling a lie. There was no such God . . . perhaps there was no God at all!

It was a pretty early age to embrace agnosticism, but there it was.

My subsequent childhood contacts with the church didn't help to remove any seeds of suspicion thus sown. In Sunday School the teacher made a lasting impression on me—and not a good one. She told her open-mouthed pupils that they all had a rope within them, and that every time they told a lie another knot formed itself in the rope. I had told my quota of lies, and at that moment I became conscious of a bellyful of kinks. Every time thereafter when I would catch myself fibbing, my hand would clap itself over my stomach automatically and I would be overcome by a wretched feeling of misery. To this day I can't see a rope without a sensation of discomfort.

It began to become plain to me that by the tenets of our church I was a lost soul. Since no one gives himself up without a fight, I refused to accept this. It was easier and more pleasant to take another tack—disbelieve the church. And I did.

I made my foster parents, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Hodgman, who still live in Bloomington, pretty unhappy with my attitude. I would question their most cherished beliefs. I remember, when I was about 14, attending the Methodist Church one Sunday and then coming home and telling my foster father I saw no difference at all between Methodism and our own Baptist faith. "Besides, there weren't any more people at the service than come to our services," I added. "Hardly a third of the church filled. If they are the same, why don't they just have the one church and save on ministers and buildings?"

He argued that there was a difference, but the only one he could name was the form of baptismal; the Baptists believed in total immersion while the Methodists just sprinkled. I saw this as just a variation in symbolism and was not convinced.

I PERSISTED as a skeptic, though not a hard-bitten one, well into adulthood. I would waver during boyhood crises. For instance, once I was forbidden to drive our Model T and took it out anyway. It got stuck in a ditch. I was desperate to get it out and back in the garage before my foster parents, who were away, would arrive back home. When the wheels spun uselessly and all my heaving failed to budge the car, I decided to give Divine Intervention a chance . . . I prayed. Almost immediately—and it was a bit frightening as well as a relief—a farmer came along with a team of horses, and pulled me out. But my old attitude soon returned. What I needed was a much more believable God, not one so disconcerting—at least He was disconcerting as originally presented to me.

When I was 17 I left home to study at Western Michigan College at Kalamazoo. There was a good bit of religious activity around the campus, and I attended a few rallies held to foster faith among the students. The theme of the talks was always "Go to your church," but neither the people who presented them nor the way they went about it convinced me. There was always a sort of "save yourself" motivation to their appeals, and this seemed to me (and still does) a selfish basis for sparking a man's faith. Roughly, I think I felt that church should represent a chance to serve others, and thus God; rather than serve God, and thus yourself. There was one other way in which I felt that the church was improperly regarded. When I would come home during vacations and show no particular desire to attend services, my folks were hurt. To go to church was a family custom. Not to go was not only to exhibit lack of faith but reflect on the family. I felt all sorts of weight on me to go. I felt that I was regarded as being smart-alecky for not going. But custom is something one does from habit, without thought, and I could not help feel that such mechanical piety was not in reality true religious observance. Still I went, to please my folks, and felt that if there was a God he should resent my being there.

I think that, though I was a young man by this time, I was still conscious of God as a being; to some extent He was still a man who resembled Grandfather McMeeking but was not personally as nice as Grandfather. No great change in my views was going to occur until I would come to think of God as an idea, a conception of that phase of our existence which cannot be touched, weighed, or even located, which is called the soul, and which gives us the thought and emotion which characterizes the human animal from the other animals. And I know I was seeking this idea without being aware of the fact that I was on such a search. When I left college to work in Cleveland, no one there urged me to go to church . . . and there I did go. I went most often those days to the Unitarian Church where, it appeared to me, there was more of a discussion of the significance of God than a constant exhortation in His name.

I N this way I grew up, without faith, you might say; and yet today I am a man of faith. It isn't a formalized faith, yet it is a deep and true one. No one preached it to me, no one opened my eyes to it—it just came . . . and it is still coming. I found it part of love, when love came to me. I found it part of the immensity of the sky when, all alone, I lay in a slit-trench underneath it. I found it the only explanation for the wonder of the birth of my children, my own flesh and blood. I find it now in a growing consciousness of something above and beyond the words and the deeds of everyday life. I know that it comes to others this way, too.

On January 1, 1942, I sailed for the war front as a field service volunteer ambulance driver. I was attached to the British 8th Army in Libya and Egypt for 18 months, eight months of this time under fire in the Tobruk and El Alamein campaigns. Not to believe in God there, in the awesome flatness of the desert under the vault of the heavens, was an impossibility. Here came my conversion to faith, not once, but again and again. The sweep of God's hand, evident in the vast distances everywhere before my eyes, was conducive to the swelling of the soul . . . and it swelled, I knew, for and about Him.

I was not far from the Holy Land those days, and now when Christmas comes and my children ask for the story of Bethlehem, I am considered the most authoritative source. I try to do a good job but it is a little disconcerting when my audience, composed of my twin six-year-olds, Melinda and Susan, reveal that their curiosity extends only to the presents the Christ Child got. "Were His as nice as ours?" they want to know.

On the other hand I disappoint them at times, particularly in the matter of prayers. Prayers, it seems to me, are truly learned in childhood or never. I have since committed the popular prayers to memory, but they don't stick. Once, after a six months' tour away from home, I started to lead Susan in bedtime prayer as usual. I got as far as "Now I lay me down to sleep . . ." and couldn't think of the rest. She waited a moment then burst into tears.

Actually, I make no attempt to instruct my children in religion; rather I try to answer their questions as clearly as I can. When the twins wanted to go to Sunday School, my wife and I sent them. I think I would like the twins, and two-year-old Timothy, when he gets old enough, to go to church—not only the Protestant church, but the Catholic and Jewish churches as well. I think it will not harm them to know all the ways in which God is sought. I know it will set them to thinking, and if they can think their way to faith, as well as feel their way, the bond will be that much stronger.

MY closest friends are of all faiths . . . and I know no better people. When the United States entered the war, I returned from abroad and joined the American army in which I was assigned to officers' training school at Camp Lee, Virginia. A fellow student who graduated from school with me was Andy Levine, an old Jewish friend from Kalamazoo. Andy was my best man when I got married in the Little Church Around the Corner in New York. He fell so in love with the ceremony that when he wanted to get married he asked me to see if he, too, couldn't get married there.

I talked to Dr. Randolph Roy, the Episcopalian minister of the church, and at first he could not see how this could be accomplished. The tenets of the church expressly forbade such a marriage at its own altar. But from the start of the war there had been established a Victory altar in the chapel, and it was there that Andy was married. I have seen Dr. Roy many times since then, most often at the Lambs Club in New York, and he always makes the same inquiry: "How are my friends, the Levines?"

When I left for Africa as an ambulance driver, I carried with me not only Andy's good wishes but a Catholic prayer book given me by the mother of another boy friend. She came to me at a farewell party held for me and thrust it into my hand. "This will bring you through," she said. "Keep it with you always."

At that time my faith was not what it is today. Yet I kept the book on me, in a side coat pocket, always. I never read it but, after a few close calls in battle, it began to mean something. When I got back to the United States, I heard one day that this Catholic boy was in the army and about to sail for Europe. It suddenly became most important that I get his mother's book to him. There was no question in my mind but that he would come through, as I did, if he took it along. I made a trip to New York to present it to him. He came back unscathed.

THIS may seem an odd mixing of the faiths and the symbols which denote them: a Jewish boy married by a Protestant minister; a Protestant boy finding protection in a Catholic prayer book; a Catholic mother who extends the good words of her belief beyond her faith. But I feel it is eminently right. Whatever else the way of God, it must be boundless. I used to think that I had traveled to the outskirts of His domain before at last I turned to face inwards and retrace my steps again. But did I? Couldn't I have gone much further and still not go beyond Him when once belief came to me?

I was married hardly more than a year when I first went to war. I wrote many letters back to my wife, Jane, from North Africa. But the one I recall best had the following line in it: "I have come to believe again in a God."

I have.

Completely honest with himself, Gene Kelly knows that a movie of nothing but ballet is a tremendous gamble. Many of his gravest doubts were erased, however, the day he received a special Oscar for An American In Paris. In spite of anything he may have said before, or even at the time, he was thrilled to receive it. As a matter of fact, he didn't quite believe the BBC broadcaster who announced it. It took a recording from Hollywood, and a playback of those familiar voices in the actual ceremony to convince him. It was almost too good to be true. It meant more than personal acclaim. It meant that the public had accepted his ideas; that it was eager to receive the best he could give. It also meant that he could count on all the studio backing he needed.

Although the famous Kelly feet will star in only the "Clown" and "Modern" dances (he may do a "bit" in the jewel sequence) Invitation is really his baby. His heart and imagination will be in every downbeat, in every gesture. He is acting, dancing, choreographing, directing, and inspiring every foot of film.

Naturally, this kind of hard work means that Gene is not overly eager for gaiety and nightlife after studio hours. Much as he loves people, he has no time for parties, clubbing, or even the theater. He just wants to go home, relax, maybe dream up some new ideas.

COUNTRY living, though ideal, was out of the question considering Gene's hectic schedule. No more such idyllic spots as the darling old mill they'd lived in in France. There the great wheels had long since stopped churning water, and were covered with the kind of ivy that only grows on the handsome estates just outside of Chartres. The Moulin de La Roche, 40 kilometers from Paris, was fine while Gene was in the planning stages, but now, with things rolling, the Kellys had to live in the center of bustling London town.

It was no easy job to find a place. Many British homes, no matter how beautiful, look stiff and formal to American eyes. They looked absolutely forbidding to Betsy, remembering her casual California home.

The Kelly family was almost in despair the day they were sent off to somewhere called "the Mews." The agent, of course, knew it meant a row of coach houses around a "yard." But Betsy and Gene were delightfully surprised to step into a wide alleyway, with the mews branching off it. There are three soft old brick houses, all identical, on one side of the yard. Three exactly like them are primly mirrored on the other side.

They knew "their" house on sight. It is typically English, but seems to have a touch of California about it. The two upper floors have two bedrooms and a bath each; the first floor has a tavern-type dining room adjoining a spacious living room. The house seemed just tailor-made for an actor.

As a matter of fact, it is. After they'd settled the deal, the agent told them that it is Robert Donat's town house. Gene noticed at the time that Betsy seemed strangely affected by this news. He thought no more about it, however, until Mr. Donat called on the telephone.

It seems that Donat had left a silver baby spoon in the house, and wondered if Mrs. Kelly would be good enough to find and send it on to him. Mrs. Kelly began blushing like a school-girl.

"Yes, Mr. Donat. Of course, Mr. Donat. I'll look, Mr. Donat," she stammered between giggles.

Gene couldn't believe his ears. When she hung up he accused her of sounding like a teen-aged fan, and did a creditable imitation of her to prove it. It was then that she admitted the awful truth. Long before she was a teen-ager she developed a hopeless love for Robert Donat. She was his A No. 1 fan. And still is.

The second time, she called him. She wanted permission to repaint the dining nook. Mr. Donat was out, but would call back. The living room was filled with friends celebrating Gene's birthday on August 23rd when the call came. He had alerted them all to the reaction his lovely wife underwent, and Betsy was determined to thwart them. She would maintain womanly poise and dignity. But when her idol's voice came over the phone, she reverted to type. She giggled and carried on. Gene has never stopped teasing her. And what is worse, she's afraid they'll be evicted, on good evidence, as unstable tenants.

This of course, is sheer nonsense. Even the energetic English are impressed by the "ard worker" her husband is. And her daughter, fresh from school in France, is their idea of the perfect visitor.

In The Student Prince, Mario Lanza was slated for 26 songs, leaving exactly 30 minutes for the story.

Kerry Kelly is a delightful child, according to any standard. She is that appealing creature, a shy, well-mannered little girl who is interested in others. Londoners often see Kerry and her mother at London Bridge, the Tower, Westminster or other points of local pride. Kerry looks into all of them. Then she writes full and interesting letters to her many friends at home in California, and her Parisian schoolmates. She learned to speak and write French beautifully last year. It was her first experience with a private school. At home she attends the neighborhood public school. This year she will again attend private school in England, but the exact one hasn't yet been chosen.

This switching around educationally is pretty hard for a little girl. First there's the language problem, but she overcame that wonderfully in Paris. This year, in England, of course, it will be smooth sailing. Then, Kerry sometimes gets a little homesick for her chums in Hollywood.

Betsy suspects that she sometimes gets a little homesick for Dublin, Ireland, too, although Kerry Kelly has been there only once. Here's how it happened.

AFTER Gene finished making Devil Makes Three in Munich he was ready for a short breather. He and Betsy decided on a week's holiday in North Africa. They rented a car in Casablanca, and spent a wonderful, non-spectacular seven days casually visiting all the little towns in the French Moroccan area. At least it was non-spectacular for the Kellys. French Morocco may never be the same. They are great movie fans there, which rather surprised Gene. But very respectful ones, standing quietly at a good distance, just looking. (In Germany, it is quite the reverse. Stars are followed around everywhere.)

The vacation was fine, except for one thing. Kerry was in school, and couldn't come. So her Daddy promised to make it up to her as soon as they got together.

On the very first Bank Holiday after they arrived in London, all the Kellys headed for Dublin. From the moment they started, Gene and Kerry were like nine-year-olds. For what Donat does to Betsy, Dublin does for her husband and daughter. The mere name of the place thrills them. They prowled the countryside for hours. They haunted ancient castles. Long before the too short holiday was ended, Gene had instilled the love of Ireland in Kerry. And it looks as if it will remain a life-long romance.

Back in Engand again, the Kellys set right to work. Gene on the picture. Betsy and Kerry on Operation Birthday. Gene's birthday falls on August 23rd, and the ladies in the family determined to make a "thing" of it. Kerry became engrossed in a "secret project." Secret from everyone but her mother, that is. She has fine artistic talent, which has developed wonderfully this past year. She turned out an amazingly good painting for her father's birthday present. Meantime, she kept encouraging her mother to bake a home-made cake.

Betsy Kelly is an artist in the kitchen. In their early years in Hollywood she did every scrap of her own housekeeping. But baking a cake in London was more of a problem than she'd bargained for.

It wasn't a matter of getting the ingredients, Great Britain is, of course, on an Austerity Program. But for proper ration coupons, or for visitors, shop-keepers can supply any need. The trouble was mathematics. The English figure recipes in tea-cups, not the standard American measuring cup. Betsy was as busy with pencil and paper as with egg-beater and flour-sifter. But higher education and a light hand with the pastry were triumphant. The cake was a masterpiece.

So was the party that went with it. The Kellys invited many friends for the occasion. It was a special event indeed, the first major entertainment held by this popular couple.

LONDON finds the Kellys rather unusual. Ordinarily American film stars dash around, seeing and being seen in all the smartest restaurants and elegant salons. The Kellys haunt quite different places. Betsy, for instance, is a familiar figure in the home-furnishing shops. She is personally buying everything for the house, from superb linen and silver to the most humble pot or pan. (Contrary to American custom, English houses have only furniture when let. The renter must outfit it for living.)

Inhabitants of the Mews are accustomed to seeing Kerry at the post-box. Or running down the street to meet a trim young man who walks with athletic stride, deeply absorbed in his own thoughts. Then she and her father walk to the house together, exchanging news of home happenings, or studio goings-on.

Sundays, the whole family is at home together. Betsy caring for her house and family; Kerry painting; and Gene, notebook in hand, dashing down ideas and sketches for the next day's work. Or noting an idea for Brigadoon which he will make in Scotland next spring. Or perhaps outlining a completely new scheme. This man is brimming over with ideas which the world will applaud in time, because he has the personal genius to create them and a family to back him with love and cooperation.

These happy, work-a-day Kellys may be a disappointment to a few autograph-hunting fans in Piccadilly. But the majority of Londoners couldn't be more charmed with them. For when they invaded the English capital, they invaded British hearts. And they'll never leave them, no matter where they go from here.

But then the war came and Barbara's husband became a flight instructor in the Navy. When the war was over, Taylor was overcome by wanderlust. He bought a plane, hired a co-pilot, started flying all over the country. He made pictures in England and Rome, content with only occasional visits from Barbara who remained working in Hollywood. After 12 years of marriage, a divorce solved their mutual problems, and Barbara stopped going to the Friday night fights at the Legion.

I guess she didn't go for more than a year—but a few weeks ago Barbara Stanwyck returned to the old stand, this time accompanied by a tall (6-foot-1), blond, blue-eyed young actor who was born Ralph Rathgeber but who is known in Hollywood as Ralph Meeker.

You've probably seen Ralph in Teresa, Four In A Jeep, Somebody Loves Me, or Glory Alley. His latest film, Jeopardy, in which he co-stars with Stanwyck, has yet to be released.

Ralph Meeker and Barbara Stanwyck came down to the Legion Stadium on a Friday night, and as soon as Barbara was recognized—this isn't too easy since she is one movie star who seems to melt into a crowd rather than stand out from it—many of the female tongues in the fight arena began wagging.

"Who's that man with her?" "Is that the Ralph Meeker she's been coupled with in the gossip columns? Looks a little younger than Barbara." "How long have they been going together?" "Is it true he still carries a torch for Robert Taylor?" "I hear she and Meeker are engaged. They say he's a strange one, very moody, very sensitive."

A similar flow of verbal curiosity undoubtedly accompanied their presence at the Ice Follies. Certainly the gossip columns of late have been filled with Stanwyck-Meeker items, the implication being that these two are more than casually interested in each other.

When I asked Barbara how she felt about Ralph Meeker she said flatly, "I've only known Mr. Meeker a little more than a month. He's a very talented actor and a very fine gentleman. He has a good sense of humor and is extremely versatile. In addition to his acting, I think he plays a half-dozen different musical instruments; he's certainly a very fine pianist. I look forward to his developing into one of the finest actors in motion pictures. It's just a question of whether or not he's cast in the right part.

"Where did I meet him? Over at the studio. We played in Jeopardy together. Anything serious between us? Well, I told you. I've only known him for a month or so which isn't very long to know a man. I think he's a fine person, but there's certainly nothing serious between us. We've been out a few times together, and I enjoy his company.

"What else? There's nothing else except that as a colleague of Mr. Meeker's I can tell you that he's very conscientious, very industrious. He has an extensive background in the theater, and well, that's just about all I know."

BARBARA Stanwyck is without a doubt the smartest, shrewdest, canniest, most honest, hard-working actress in Hollywood—but the above quotation, uttered with great care and deliberation, is the kind of quotation which reflects absolutely nothing of her true and inner feelings regarding this young man who has recently entered her life.

It says nothing, for example, about the morning a few weeks ago when Ralph Meeker was flying in from New York. John Van Druten, the playwright, had asked Ralph to fly east, to read for the lead in his new play, I've Got Sirpence. Ralph, who took Marlon Brando's place in the New York company of A Streetcar Named Desire and has acted in some 70 different plays, didn't particularly like the part in Van Druten's new opus and bowed out. He caught the first midnight plane for Hollywood and when he arrived at 7:30 the following morning, there was Barbara Stanwyck waiting eagerly to throw her arms around him.

As Ralph disembarked from the DC-6, Barbara ran to him crying, "How are you, Ralph?" They hugged each other tightly. The words, "Mr. Meeker" were conspicuous by their absence in Barbara's demonstrative greeting. It was strictly "Ralph" all the way.

Barbara drove Ralph in her car to his home in the Hollywood hills. Cai Fryendahl, Ralph's Danish jack-of-all trades, had a warm and appetizing breakfast ready. Then Barbara drove home. No matter what she may say, no actress is going to get up at 5:30 A.M. and race out to the Los Angeles Municipal Airport to meet a handsome young man if that handsome young man is just another actor who doesn't mean anything to her. Nor will she accompany him to the Ice Follies, the

Tall in the Saddle

When, as a part of Greg Peck's role in Duel in the Sun, he was told, "You'll have to jump over a horse's rear end and land in the saddle while it's in full gallop," he took himself to a riding stable and rode for three solid weeks. Not content with learning to ride, he mastered roping and wore cowboy costumes from dawn until dusk to get used to the feel of levis, a close-hugging shirt, and high, cowpoke heels. The only flaw was the fact that his hips were so narrow his gun belt showed a tendency to slip down around his ankles.

boxing matches, the movies, entertain for him at her home, dine with him at his, and see him more often than she has seen any other man in the past six months.

Thus on the basis of the available evidence, Barbara Stanwyck is more than fond of Ralph Meeker. Now, whether this interest will lead to love or more particularly to matrimony, no one can say.

MEEKER, according to people who know him best, is a moody, enigmatic sensitive individual who belongs to the slightly Bohemian or Marlon Brando school of actors. Press agents who have tried to work with him report that while he is not uncooperative, he certainly is not to be called communicative.

A reporter who asked him about his friendship and repeated meetings with Barbara Stanwyck was told, "There's not supposed to be any publicity about that." "Who made that ruling?" asked the newsmen.

"I did," Meeker reportedly answered.

On another occasion, the young actor was asked, "How do you feel about Barbara Stanwyck?"

"A good friend," was all he would say.

A year or so ago when Meeker was living with Kurt Kaszner, an Austrian beer barrel of a man who is also under contract to MGM as a character actor, he would frequently say, "I'm never going to get married." But that was before he made Jeopardy with Barbara Stanwyck.

Barbara, in case you don't know it, has for years been regarded by the men who work with her as the swellest person in the movie colony. When it was learned, for example, that it was Robert Taylor who wanted the divorce and not she, one of the chief electricians at the studio pretty much reflected the general Hollywood masculine opinion when he said, "Robert Taylor must have rocks in his head. I don't care where or how long he looks, he ain't never gonna find a nicer dame than Stanwyck."

Men consider Barbara well-nigh irresistible, largely because she seems devoid of such feminine traits as indecision, pettiness, and vindictiveness. When Barbara has something to say, she says it. When she hasn't, she remains quiet. When a makeup man finishes with her, she never tries to improve on his work. Unlike dozens of other actresses, all less talented than she, Stanwyck never insists upon directing her director, outwitting her writer, or out-producing her producer.

Fritz Lang, for example, who has fought with a good many stars, and who directed Barbara in Clash By Night, says, "She is an angel. Directing her is a genuine pleasure."

Fred MacMurray who acted opposite Stanwyck in one of her best films, Double Indemnity, for which she received an Academy nomination, says, "The wonderful thing about working with Stanwyck is that she makes you try and reach her level which is pretty darn high. She is letter perfect in her lines, and if you fluff yours, she's always patient, helpful, and understanding. She's what you might call a dream-girl."

Jack Benny, who uses her on his radio and TV shows as frequently as she will permit, says, "Barbara Stanwyck is one of the three greatest performers I've ever met." The other two, in his opinion, are Ingrid Bergman and Ethel Merman.

STANWYCK, who is 45 and doesn't hide the fact—actually she looks no more than 33—is particularly helpful when it comes to young actors. This is probably one reason why Ralph Meeker finds her tops.

I remember when Bill Holden was first breaking into motion pictures. He was playing the lead in Golden Boy and not finding it too easy. Each day a group of well-wishers would go to Harry Cohn, studio chief, and say, "This kid was great at the Pasadena Playhouse. Why didn't we send him back?"

It was Stanwyck, however, who knocked herself out at the front office with pleas that Holden be kept on the job. She worked with him after hours, rehearsing and teaching; today Holden's gratitude knows no bounds.

Similarly, Barbara was of great help to Meeker in Jeopardy. In this one she plays the wife of a man (Barry Sullivan) who's trapped on a sandbar by a fallen jetty. Trying to obtain help for her husband, she is held by an escaped convict (Ralph Meeker) who plans to take her and her car to Mexico and leave the husband behind to drown.

In the production of this picture, Barbara saw to it that Meeker came off well. She was in a position to demand close-ups, favored camera angles, more lines, more scenes. Instead she insisted upon sharing the spotlight with Meeker, seeing to it that his part was given major attention.

Certainly Stanwyck took infinitely more pains with Ralph than Betty Hutton did when they both made Somebody Loves Me at Paramount. Meeker sings fairly well but not well enough for Somebody Loves Me, and Pat Morgan's singing voice had to be dubbed in for his. Also his relationship with Hutton was rather strained—so strained in fact that one morning when Betty saw Meeker getting off a plane at the airport—it was the same plane Stanwyck met—she avoided running into Ralph.

Ralph Meeker is 32 years old, the only child of a broken home. He was born in Minneapolis, raised by aunts in Chicago, and attended Northwestern University where he starred in drama club plays along with two young student actresses, Patricia Neal and Jean Hagen.

He worked his way through college playing a variety of musical instruments from piano to vibraphone. In 1943 he finally landed a small part in the Broadway production of Doughgirls.

WHETHER it was the ceaseless struggle on Broadway to make good, with relatively few funds, or whether it was his unhappy youth, perhaps it was a combination of both these factors—the truth is that Ralph Meeker today is regarded as a talented young actor who doesn't have many friends, one who is inordinately sensitive, one who believes in going his own way, one who is reluctant to praise what others consider outstanding.

A friend who knew him on Broadway says, "He came up the hard way, and he's afraid of people—not exactly afraid but wary. He's had to work hard for everything he ever got, and he's learned to be self-sufficient. Getting a break on Broadway, you know, is really a dog's life. Why, Ralph has done everything, USO shows, stock companies, the subway circuit, anything you can think of he's played. It was Josh Logan who got him his first decent break. Josh gave him a part in Mr. Roberts and when Marlon Brando left A Streetcar Named Desire, Josh ran into Irene Mayer Selznick—she was the producer of Streetcar—and said, 'I think I've got the fellow to take Brando's place.'

"Ralph read the part and worked for more than a month before they gave him the job. He stayed with the play for a year and took it on the road. It was Irene Selznick who talked Fred Zinnemann (who was going to direct Teresa in Italy) into giving Meeker a chance in motion pictures.

"Fred signed Ralph for the role of the sergeant and took him to Italy. When Teresa was finished, Zinnemann recommended him for Four In A Jeep which was shot in Austria. After that, Meeker came home and flew to Hollywood where Metro signed him to a term contract."

Friends of Barbara Stanwyck insist that her relationship with Meeker is platonic. "Let's face it," one of them says. "Barbara is 45. This Meeker chap is 32. Barbara has always loved helping people. Here's a struggling young actor trying to fight his way to the top. Barbara's helped dozens of them. She's helping this one, too.

"Maybe he takes her out a couple of times a week. What of it? He's a bachelor and she doesn't have a husband, and she's much too beautiful and witty to sit home alone and just hibernate. She's a girl who likes to live. Unfortunately so many activities in Hollywood, so many activities anywhere, call for a male escort.

"How many male escorts are there in Hollywood? Cesar Romero, Farley Granger, Lon McCallister, Scott Brady, maybe one or two more. A couple of months ago Farley Granger called for Barbara, took her to some party. Next day it was in all the columns, a brand new love affair. Heck, Barbara's adopted son, who's in the Navy now—he's almost as old as Granger.

"I'm not saying that Stanwyck isn't in the market for another husband—every unmarried woman is. But certainly she's much too smart to pick on a youngster like Meeker. She married Robert Taylor, and he was only a few years younger than she. Look what happened to that one. She's much too smart to make the same mistake twice.

"Besides she's accustomed to running things, to being a little dominant, and so is Meeker. Stanwyck, as I said before, is a woman men admire. She isn't the kind to lead a manless life. Sure she goes up to Meeker's house off Sunset Plaza and dines with him and looks down on the city lights while he softly plays the piano. Sure the whole setup spells romance—only Barbara isn't a little girl who can be swept off her feet.

"Here's a woman with a basic sense of values, who sizes up the situation and the man involved. When and if she marries again it will be a mature man of accomplishment, a guy in his forties.

"There's a great unrequited streak of the maternal in Stanwyck's makeup. For my money, Ralph Meeker brings it out. In her I'm sure he sees a combination of mother-sweetheart-wife-and-sister which is probably an ideal relationship for a long and endearing friendship, but certainly not one for a marriage."

EVER since her divorce from Robert Taylor other friends of Stanwyck's say that the one reason she has worked so consistently is that she wants no spare time in which to mull over her past; that in a way she is using Meeker as an antidote for the hurt Taylor caused her. There may be a modicum of truth in this supposition but not more. Stanwyck doesn't mope and mourn. When she drops a man she seems to lock a door in her heart.

I remember when she divorced Frank Fay. Frank was difficult to live with as the divorce proceedings well brought out, so that perhaps this was an atypical case. But there was a time when Barbara was so headlong in love with Fay that it hurt. That was back in 1920 when Fay was the emcee at Texas Guinan's supper club. Barbara had just been graduated from the chorus line to the legitimate stage and Fay was her idea of perfection. When Fay sent her a telegram from St. Louis one night offering to marry her, she grabbed the first express train out of New York—much to her later sorrow.

With Bob Taylor it was a little different. The Marx Brothers invited her to their home for dinner one night explaining that they wanted her to meet a Mr. Artigue, which was their favorite name for Robert Taylor. Stanwyck didn't know this and spent all evening explaining to Mr. Taylor that she was really supposed to have a date with a Mr. Artigue. Taylor finally spoiled the gag by pointing out that his initials were R.T. and that according to the queer Marx system of spelling these two initials spelled "Artigue".

Barbara Stanwyck was ecstatic with joy when she finally got rid of Frank Fay. Her heart was filled with sorrow when she lost Bob Taylor—not only because she loved Bob dearly but because it is a sad thing for any woman to find herself at the age of 43 without a husband and with the necessity of winning another.

Stanwyck has enough money to spend the rest of her days in idleness, although she is constitutionally incapable of doing so. But all her wealth will not obtain for her the kind of mature, accomplished loving husband she needs.

UNTIL such a man comes along, actor like Ralph Meeker and Jean Pierr Aumont—and there will undoubtedly be others—these young men must be looked upon as stopgaps in the interlude of loneliness.

the true life story of marilyn monroe

And Marilyn herself, in the morning will hardly remember the incident, or the fact that she was really aroused by the alarming wail of a distant police prowler car. She would deny, even to herself, that in half wakefulness a split-second question passed in her mind: "I wonder if that's Jim?"

Jim, the dark-haired handsome football star, the boy she loved and the man who, rightly or wrongly, rejected her love by persistently thwarting her ambitions. Jim, the ex-husband, and police rookie who came to her side when she needed him, after their divorce, but who still could not be moved by the tears of the loveliest, sexiest girl in Hollywood.

Amazing? Yes, when we think of Marilyn Monroe as the most sought after girl in Hollywood. But no—no, the situation is not so startling when we remember that for all of us the first big love in our lives is the one we always keep for a secret place in our hearts.

I know whereof I speak, for the Jim in Marilyn Monroe's life is my brother, and as Marilyn Monroe's ex-sister-in-law, I have decided that the time has come to tell the real truth about the girl for whom I once wept, cheered, frequently despaired of as a member of the family. And whom I still love as though divorce and fame had not again made us the strangers we were before our first meeting.

My mother was living on a small ranch in the San Fernando Valley, and just behind the house my folks lived in was, a small house occupied by a most charming woman by the name of Grace Goddard. As they chatted over the back fence, Grace frequently mentioned her lovely foster daughter who was living with her "Aunt Anna" in Santa Monica.

"She sounds like exactly the sort of girl Jim would like," Mother told me, the day I first met the girl who is known today as Marilyn Monroe. Not quite 15, she was the most beautiful little creature I had ever seen. Not only did she have beauty, but everything else it takes to make a lady. I loved her from the beginning. I told Mother, "You know how Jim is, so stubborn, sometimes. She's just the girl for him, but if he thinks we want them to start going together nothing will happen."

So we contrived for the two of them to meet, and I was right.

Honest and forthright, Marilyn (I'll call her that, but her name was Norma then) told Jim right off how old she was. He liked her, but he thought she was much too young to date. Mother and I made no comment, and just like a man Jim fell and fell hard on their second meeting. At the time, I lived in Ventura County. It was only a short distance to beautiful Lake Sherwood, and on Sundays Jim always brought Marilyn to spend the day. They went fishing, rowing, or just went hiking.

My brother Jim always needed a little explaining. He was as handsome as they come, but he was always the gentleman, and never the wise guy. His father used to say, "Jim ain't got no smart," but he didn't mean it unkindly. He meant that Jim was unmercifully honest and old-fashioned. We were all proud of him for it.

As for Marilyn, little by little on these Sundays I came to know her and the facts about her early life. They were not pleasant, no wonder that to the present day she has wanted to keep them secret. She is learning, but cannot seem to realize, that the best thing to do is to cheerfully admit your background. Then no one will dig it up as a big "scoop" later on. Betty Hutton felt the same way Marilyn did for awhile. Then, after a writer revealed the fact that she used to sing for pennies and nickels outside saloons in Detroit when she was little, Betty became proud of her tough beginnings, as well she should.

Marilyn talked to me many times about her childhood. It is quite true that she was "kicked around" a lot, and "farmed out" to various families, because her mother was taken ill and couldn't care for her. But there is a significant fact about this situation. Marilyn was such a wonderful child that she completely captivated the two most outstanding families she lived with. They were comparatively poor people with children of their own, but they loved and cared for Marilyn in a way that couldn't have been bettered by any millionaire whose name you'd find in the social register.

There was one very religious family (Marilyn herself turned to Christian Science) that loved her dearly, but had to give her up because they just couldn't afford another mouth to feed. Still, the mother of the family was invited to her wedding at Marilyn's insistence. A docile and subdued little person, her pride and devotion cast a glow of warmth over the whole event.

Then there was another family. They were maladjusted to life. They drank a good deal, and Marilyn prayed for them. She was only about seven years old at the time, and told me that her only dolls were empty whiskey bottles. "Day after day," she said, "I'd dress the 'dead soldiers' in little wisps of cloth and call them 'my babies.' And when I grew up, I could understand one thing a lot of parents couldn't. They'd give beautiful dolls to their children who in turn would ignore them and play with little beaten up characters made of rubber with the painted eyes gone. To me, those whiskey bottles were real dolls, and I think that most parents should pay more attention to what's in a child's mind than they do to the pretty things they can buy to influence that mind."

It happened when George Oppenheimer was writing the screen play for a Joan Crawford movie which was directed by Vincent Sherman. George and Sherman didn't get along well and the director rewrote the script on the set. After the picture came out—and it wasn't a hit—Oppenheimer always referred to it as "Sherman's march through George."

I AM certain that people laugh, today, when they read what some reporter has to say about Marilyn's intelligence. I don't. She learned about life and psychology in the school that has produced not only our greatest actors, but our statesmen and educators as well. That was a hard school, and let's face it, the forbidden question of sex comes to girls at a much earlier age than most parents will admit. Girls who come from the wealthiest and finest of families suffer from want of understanding in this respect. Marilyn didn't. Her mother, born under an ill-fated star, was unable to give Marilyn the constant companionship she needed, but she did give her a great love, and it was returned by her daughter. Unfortunately, her mother's illness prevented her from giving Marilyn all the attention she needed at this age, but other women gave Marilyn her attitude and intelligence toward the opposite sex with the result that she was a thoroughly "good girl."

That's why, today, you'll find hardboiled reporters speaking with such utter amazement about Marilyn's fine qualities. She may look like the greatest movie siren since Jean Harlow, but, like Jean, this is all window dressing. I've never known a man who really got to know Marilyn who didn't look at her with as much respect as they would accord to their own sisters.

I AM not an expert writer. If I were, I might try to break your heart with the account of the occasions on which, driving with Marilyn through Hollywood to our place in the country, she'd point out a beautiful white house high in the hills. "I lived there once," she'd say, "before mother was ill. It was beautiful. The most wonderful furniture you can imagine. A baby grand piano, and a room of my own. It all seems like a dream."

No wonder her memory clung to those days, for despite the kindness of the people with whom she lived, Marilyn's beauty could readily have turned her into a tough, cynical teen-ager. For instance, at one time there was a young smart alec about 16 years of age who habitually hung around a certain corner which she had to pass on her way home from school. He took great delight in making obviously obscene remarks. When she could stand it no longer, Marilyn told an older companion what was happening. The next time she crossed this street, her friend followed a few yards behind her. The boy began to annoy Marilyn, and in an instant her friend grabbed him, slapped him soundly and called for the police. A store-keeper came out and testified to the fact that the boy was lying in his claims of innocence. The fellow was let go with a stern warning.

In spite of the problems of moving from family to family and school to school, she was a good student, a gracious and decent girl. My mother and I sensed this, in the way that women will, which is why we were proud when she began to go with Jim. And believe me, if she hadn't been a fine girl, we'd have done everything we could to break up the romance, because Jim—

Well, let me tell you about him. From the time Jim Dougherty, bless his fiery Irish heart, was a small boy, he loved music and could fight his way through a whole school of tough kids. At Van Nuys elementary school he took up the violin and played in the orchestra. When he was 12 he joined two Mexican boys—twin brothers—in a hill-billy band. On Saturdays, they paraded thru town on a load of hay drawn by two donkeys, sawing out music and picking up two dollars apiece from their sponsors, the Wray Brothers Ford Company.

Later, at high school, Jim played smashing right tackle on the football team. He was the student body president and had the lead in every school play. One of his friends during school days was a young gas station attendant named Bob Mitchum. And among his leading ladies was the sultry Jane Russell, who received almost no attention at all because audiences were so enthusiastic about Jim's performances. Everything came naturally to Jim. He was a born leader. His music teacher, and Mr. Ingram the drafting teacher, did everything they could to get Jim to go to Santa Barbara college and become a teacher, and everyone predicted a brilliant career for the boy.

But not a bit of this adulation went to Jim's head. He liked to do things the hard way. In the summer he earned his own clothes by cleaning stables at a riding academy, mowing lawns and lighting the red lanterns over street repairs. He worked in the mortuary in Van Nuys. All he lacked was the ambition to stand in the spotlight.

When he proposed to Marilyn, none of us knew about it until they returned with the ring. Jim was 21 at the time, and Marilyn not quite 16.

"Do you know what?" he said to me in amazement. "She wouldn't take the engagement ring I'd picked out. She said it was much too expensive, so we picked out a smaller set." I've never seen a happier girl after the engagement announcement.

In the crowded memories one big day was the Sunday on which we had our annual family picnic at Lake Sherwood. Among those present was our family minister, the Reverend B. H. Lingenfelter of the Christian Church of Torrance, California. When he was asked to officiate at the marriage on June 19th, he delightedly explained that this was the same date as his own marriage many years before.

Most of the afternoon, during lulls in the hilarity, Jim strummed the guitar and sang "I Love You Truly" and "Always" to Marilyn, who was unusually pensive that day. Her only contribution to the fun was a quiet smile of pride—and six lemon pies. (They were dreams, and I never did get the recipe, which she learned from her mother.)

I recall that it was Aunt Anna (with whom Marilyn lived for some time) who had the wedding dress made. It was a lovely thing of eyelet embroidered organdy, and while a group of us were looking at it, someone brought up the question of who would give the reception after the wedding. Marilyn spoke up promptly and said, "The bride's parents are supposed to take care of that!"

"I know dear," one of the catty feminine neighbors said, "but you have no parents." I'll never forget the look of sadness Marilyn gave me. And I still detest the thought of that offending woman.

To this day I can close my eyes and see the wedding as though it were a part of last night's movie. Marilyn was the most gorgeous bride I've ever seen. The wedding was held in a lovely home of family friends on Bronson Avenue in Westwood. Their twin daughters were the ribbon-stretchers and my son, Westy, age eight, was the ring bearer, proudly carrying the wedding rings on a satin pillow. (Today he is at Camp Kilmer, New Jersey, awaiting embarkation for overseas duty.)

Everyone seemed to be weeping as the "I do's" were said, except the bride and groom. As they kissed, Mrs. Anderson, who had kept Marilyn for awhile, exclaimed, "That's my baby! That's my baby!" I know that Marilyn was saddened because her own mother couldn't be present, but on that happy day she had a half-dozen mothers!

Then, after the moment of ecstasy, the fun started. My older brother, Marion, who never could resist a practical joke said that it would be a shame to deprive the public of a chance to see such a beautiful creature. (He didn't know how prophetic his words were.) And as a result, after the wedding pictures were taken, Marilyn was kidnapped!

Marilyn appeared at the proper moment and we all waited for her to throw the bridal bouquet. She raised her arm and exclaimed, "To heck with that! I'm taking these flowers home to press and keep." A moment later, she disappeared. Jim searched for her and was finally told that she was out in front in a car, ready to go to the Florentine Gardens, a night spot on Hollywood Boulevard about a mile below Vine Street. It took a lot of persuasion for Jim to go along, but he finally did, and when they entered the place, the band struck up "Here Comes The Bride." During the drinking of toasts to the bride, a Conga line was started, and Marilyn joined it, still wearing her veil. She seemed to be having the time of her life but I did see her look anxiously toward Jim every now and then, who appeared to be sulking at the sidelines. I knew he was only trying to be patient while his friends had their fun, and it didn't occur to me that this scene was an actual preview of what was to happen to their love some years later.

You may have read in some column or other a casual reference to Marilyn Monroe's marriage to a young aircraft worker—a marriage of short duration. Don't you believe it! Those two kids were married for four years. They were so madly in love that it hurt to watch them. The reasons for their divorce were pathetic, almost stupid, but at no time during their marriage was Marilyn other than a dutiful, adoring wife and a perfect housekeeper.

I'm a little ahead of the story, but I had to say that, because I love my brother Jim, and I loved Marilyn as I would my own sister.

There was no time for a honeymoon, because Jim had just started work at the Lockheed Aircraft factory. So they moved into a little house they rented on Bessemer Street in Van Nuys, and Marilyn plunged into the role of housewife with great eagerness. At last she had her own home. She tried out recipes by the dozen on all of us. If ever there was a girl in love with her man, Marilyn showed it in every way.

You can learn plenty from Hollywood prop men. One told me that all champagne bottles, besides the standard magnum, are named for Biblical characters. There's the Jeroboam (4 quarts), the Rehoboam (6 quarts), the Methuselah (2 gallons) and the granddaddy of them all, the Nebuchadnezzar (5 gallons).

She packed Jim's lunch every day and on the 19th of each month, their anniversary, she always enclosed some little token or memento—a note, or a small gift.

During the first year, Marilyn came to my home many times, to play with my son, Larry. "My first baby has to be a boy," she told me, "a second Larry." And she was wonderfully kind and patient with me while I was carrying my little Denny. At the time I was staying with my mother in Van Nuys, so Marilyn stayed with me during the day, and Jim picked her up at night.

One day Marilyn asked, "Elyda, do you have to go through all this when you have a baby?"

I replied, "Yes, honey, you have to. If you want your own child you must bear it."

Without hesitation she declared, "Well then, if you do, you do. I certainly want to be the mother I was intended to be!"

On the evening of October 6, 1942, at six P.M., Marilyn left and made me promise to call her if anything happened. Denny was born the next morning at three, and when Jim and Marilyn arrived at seven, my new sister-in-law had a wee, pink and sprawling mite of humanity on her hands. She'd never handled a baby before, but her confusion soon changed. She took over exactly as though she'd been a trained nurse.

For almost a year, young Mrs. Dougherty was the happiest bride alive. Then, abruptly, Jim came home one night with the news that his draft status had changed and he had enlisted in the Maritime Service. They were separated briefly when he went to boot camp, but within a month he was back home with the news that he would be stationed at Catalina Island as an athletic instructor, and that, being a married man, a furnished apartment went with the job.

Now they were deliriously happy, for they could have their honeymoon, and Uncle Sam would pay for it!

While Jim was sweating it out with the new recruits, Marilyn did the shopping and cooking. In the evening, they danced with friends to the tunes from a new record player. And Marilyn, daytimes, seldom ventured on the beach. It was a re-occurrence of the trouble she'd had since early in her teens. She was just too beautiful. As one friend put it, "She can't help it that men's wives look at her and get so jealous they want to throw rocks!"

ALL this time Marilyn's constant companion was Muggsy, a mutt collie dog. She spent hours bathing him, grooming him, teaching him tricks. For those four delightful months they were inseparable when Jim was not home. (I mention this because old Muggsy played an important part in what happened later in their lives—and almost saved their marriage.)

Then came the day that Jim had to ship out. That weekend, Marilyn came to visit me. She'd no sooner stepped out of her car than a man, passing slowly in a convertible whistled at her and yelled, "Some shape!" Marilyn turned and yelled at him, "Move on, old man—go pick on somebody nearer your own age." And as she came up the walk, her eyes were filled with fury. That night we had a family conference and Marilyn tearfully urged mother, who was then working as company nurse at Radio Plane, makers of target planes for Air Corps gunnery practice, to help her get a job. Like many other young wives, she couldn't bear the thought of the endless lonely hours of inactivity. She couldn't find words of her own to explain to Jim, so in one of the first of her daily letters to him she simply copied the words of the song, "I Walk Alone."

And Marilyn meant every word of it. More than one man at Radio Plane wanted to date her. Even in coveralls she was lusciously feminine. But before long the word got around that Marilyn was walking alone—for keeps—until her man got home. All she thought of was working and making money to save for Jim and their future together.

I remember Mom bawling her out for working in the paint shop. "Honey," she said, "you'll ruin your beautiful hair—and all those fumes—it's just not good for your health."

But Marilyn persisted, even though she came home looking a wreck, until Mom finally settled the matter by going quietly to an official of the company, who arranged a transfer.

Marilyn never hinted that she knew what had happened, but the first thing we knew, she announced that she'd taken a modeling job. I asked her whether she'd told Jim about this. She replied simply, "Of course. I tell Jim everything."

ABOUT this time Radio Plane was planning the first company picnic, and the girl who sold the most tickets was to be crowned queen of the event. Marilyn was too preoccupied to enter into the event, but the men in her department took over, and she was elected hands down.

I'll never forget the day. When the ceremony of crowning the queen was over, Marilyn was so thrilled and touched at what her co-workers had done for her that she broke down and cried. Then, recovering her composure, she relaxed her almost chilly attitude toward the men with whom she'd been working and danced with every one of them.

"Gosh," a fellow named Bill exclaimed to me, after he'd been cut out, "what a girl!"

"I know," I replied. "Isn't it too bad she's married?"

"Yeah," he grinned ruefully. "All she talks about is 'wait until Jim gets home!'"

And when Jim did come home, Marilyn promptly introduced him to the whole gang at the next company dance. She made the complete rounds. "Joe, this is my husband, Jimmie." Then she'd stand there, completely lost in silent adoration of her man. After awhile, this routine began to embarrass Jim. He said to her, "Honey, after you introduce me, for Pete's sake start a conversation or something. Just don't stand there looking at me with those big eyes. People just don't understand!"

In those highly emotional days many hearts were broken. Service men came home to find their wives and sweethearts no longer belonged to them. When I read somewhere, a few months ago, that Marilyn had sent Jim a "Dear John" letter while he was overseas, I was furious. Marilyn never wrote such a letter, then.

Today, Jim has remarried. He has a lovely wife, three children, and is completely happy again, but his marriage to Marilyn did not crack up through jealousy and lack of faith to each other during war time.

NATURALLY, Marilyn was aware that other wives and sweethearts dated while their men were away, but she never did. Furthermore, she never gossiped about these situations, nor would she listen to gossip. Her whole life was wrapped up in her love for her husband.

The trouble that was brewing between them was a long way from the surface. When Jim came home, they had their own secret places to go together. Marilyn was lost to all her friends until Jim shipped out again. They were so completely happy that they didn't need anybody else.

The rest of the world, however, was beginning to need Marilyn. From the publicity that came from her being crowned Radio Plane Queen, more and more modeling jobs were forthcoming. Most of the time she could do these while Jim was away, but on one occasion Marilyn had some pictures to do at a turkey ranch. Jim went along and busied himself elsewhere while she was working. On the way home he kidded her about feeling like being married to a movie star.

Marilyn was very subdued when they came back to the house and went immediately to her room and closed the door. None of us thought anything about it at the time, until my son, Westy, rushed downstairs exclaiming, "Uncle Jim—Uncle Jim—Auntie is upstairs crying!"

Jim took the stairs two at a time. When he finally managed to calm Marilyn down he found out the reason for her hysteria. She had lost her engagement ring at the ranch and was completely heartbroken. This, and Jim's kidding had been too much.

Yet, in that quiet way she has, the tears were soon gone. Being a Christian Scientist, Marilyn firmly believed that they would find the ring. Imagine being certain you could locate such a tiny thing as a diamond in a field of several thousand turkeys. We all tried to convince her it was a lost cause, looking for the ring that might by this time be nestled in the tummy of a fat bird on the way to the butcher's, but she was determined.

The next day they went back to the ranch. They retraced every step Marilyn could remember they had taken, and believe it or not, came home with the ring.

Every time Jim shipped out, Marilyn went through a period of desperate loneliness. She and Mother became the closest of companions, going to the beaches and the movies together as she talked of her future plans. She was satisfied enough with the $40 salary, but as she said, "I don't want to work in the 'dope room' forever. (This was the room in which lacquer was applied to wings.) Jim will have to decide what he's going to do when the war is over, and if we're lucky, we'll have enough saved so we can have our own home and he can take plenty of time to choose the line of work that will really make him happy."

If memory serves me correctly, Mother told me about this the day before Marilyn was nearly killed in an accident. "I just love that girl," she said. "I never knew anyone more unselfish, but she is so lost in her own world that she frightens me."

The words could have been interpreted to have been a premonition, for the next evening I had a phone call. Marilyn was laughing, but there was an edge to her voice as though she was on the verge of tears. She'd been driving home from a modeling job in the little Ford V-8 she and Jim owned at the time. "I guess I must have been dreaming again," she said, "because I drove head-on into a street car. You should see our poor car. It's completely demolished!"

"But what about you?" I asked anxiously. "Are you all right?"

"Sure, honey," she replied. "All I have is a small bump on the head. I guess it's a miracle that I'm alive."

This was shortly before Christmas. Jim came home on leave, the war was almost over, and they were all set for a wonderful holiday. Then Marilyn had a call from the model agency—a nice-paying job up in the mountains for some pictures to be taken in the snow. Jim wanted her to cancel out so the family could all be together on Christmas Day. Marilyn pointed out that if she refused to go, she'd not only lose this job, but others. It was a part of what you had to put up with in the modeling profession. Anyway, he could come along with her.

You know how it is with a man, sometimes. They didn't really need the money. He felt, and not without reason, that he'd look and feel silly tracking along after her, but Marilyn couldn't see it that way. Stubbornly, they argued, until Marilyn stormed out of the house.

That was the most miserable Christmas either of them had ever spent.

Now the rift between them began to widen. With the war over and Jim home to stay, the differences which seemed small in view of their love for each other began to grow to terrible proportions. Before any of us realized what was happening, they had separated. I like to think, sometimes, that if the war had not intervened, Jim might have gone on to become an outstanding actor, and Marilyn, his wife, could then have pursued the same profession. But then, that's just a sentimental sister, dreaming.

FROM the time of Marilyn's first movie offer, the die was cast. His ultimatum was that she had to choose him or Hollywood.

Marilyn was heartsick. "I love Jimmie so much," she told Mom, "but I just can't understand his attitude."

Mother advised Marilyn to do as she thought best, and no matter what she did, she would still be loved and understood by the family, who would always stick by her.

The divorce came in the fall of 1946.

Marilyn went to Las Vegas, and when she returned we saw and heard very little of her. I know why. She blamed a great deal of the trouble on herself.

Jim was temporarily living at home the night the telephone rang. It was Marilyn. She was crying so hard I couldn't find out what the trouble was. She wanted to talk to Jim. A moment later, he rushed out of the house and I said a little prayer that this might mean reconciliation. No woman frantically calls a man she has just divorced unless she needs him, terribly.

The next day I learned that Muggsy, their ancient and lovable collie, was dead.

That moment when they faced each other in common grief over the death of their pet, the floodgates of emotion must have opened wide again to review for them their first pledge to love each other forever. But, if she cried her heart out in Jim's arms and asked him to come back to her, and he refused, I'll never know.

For when Jim returned home he never mentioned what had happened and, knowing him I wouldn't have dared to ask.

ALL this happened a little more than six years ago. For Jim's part, he found what he was looking for. He fell in love again. He found the type of work he wanted. It may be hard for Hollywood to understand the fact that he became a policeman and a darned good one. That he is happy as a public servant, and one of the best, is true. That he is a good father to the three children he loves so well, everyone knows. As his sister I can say that I am more than ordinarily proud of him.

You see, it is possible for a man and a woman to find new happiness after a first great love has failed. There is no reflection to be cast on either of these young people—Jim or Marilyn—for if any couple should penalize themselves with mental suffering for years after a marriage failure they wouldn't be normal human beings.

Marilyn and Jim, today, are young people to be proud of, even though they walk in widely separate paths—paths which have crossed only once to my knowledge since the final separation. That was on the day Jim was assigned to a studio lot where Marilyn was playing a bit part.

During the afternoon, Marilyn passed by and was surprised to see him there. They talked cheerfully for a few moments. Then Marilyn left to go back to the set. And as she did, a worker stared at "Miss Monroe" in her abbreviated costume. Like the nasty little boy way back in the days of her childhood, the fellow made a smutty remark. He must have been the most frightened man of the hour, because he was suddenly jerked off his feet in Jim's strong hands.

"Listen, you," policeman Jim Dougherty growled, "watch your language!"

"Take it easy, officer," the terrified grip gasped, "I didn't mean anything. Besides, what's it to you?"

"Nothing," Jim snapped. "Except you'd better learn never to make cracks like that to a lady. And that girl's a lady—was married to her for four years, and know!"

That's the whole story. Perhaps if you told it to a movie producer he'd say it's too improbable to be good as a picture plot. But, no matter who she may marry—Joe DiMaggio or a man she may meet tomorrow, Marilyn Monroe has lived through as great a romantic drama as she will ever star in.

As for me, her ex-sister-in-law, Elyse Nelson of Anaheim, California, a plain housewife who never tried to write anything before—much less a screen play—I call the story, "Her One True Love." EN

"we're not mad at anybody"

That Jean Simmons is a girl who packs some surprises.

That she is a lady of spunk and spirit.

That she can take care of herself.

That she's intimidated by no man. Check—and that includes her husband.

All this, of course, is contrary to a fairy tale cherished by a town which specializes in such, going something like this: Demure Jean Simmons is a beautiful damsel in distress, held in durance vile by a tyrannical ogre named Stewart Granger in a sort of Bluebeard's Castle high in the Bel-Air hills. Throughout the past two years a great many things have conspired to kick this fascinating fable along. But maybe right now is as good a time as any to kick it straight out the door.

Stewart Granger is no ogre, but a most attractive and fascinating man, deeply in love with his wife who, in her way, runs him as much as he runs her. Their house is no Bluebeard's Castle, but a beautiful Italian-style villa, too big for two, so they've moved to a smaller one. As for Jean Simmons, she is indeed a beautiful damsel, but not necessarily demure and certainly in no distress. She's crazy about her husband and, at long last, about her Hollywood career. In fact, Jack Dempsey had something there about those misdirected boxing gloves. Until lately the big punch in the Granger family has been swashbuckling Stewart while Jean, due to a protracted series of studio hassles, has remained under wraps without one released picture to her name. But 1953 is her year, and she's coming out slugging.

Jean shook herself loose as of last May 10. From then until August 15, working nights, Sundays and holidays, she established an all-time Hollywood record for marathon movie making. Jean finished three pictures in as many months. She collapsed from sheer exhaustion in the middle. But after 16 hours' sleep, bounced right back to work. As a result. Beautiful But Dangerous, The Murder, and Breakup are set to come at you—one, two, three—not to mention Androcles And The Lion, which she started two years ago February. And, if like most of the American public, you are still prone to picture Jean Simmons as a fragile Ophelia with weeping willow leaves in her hair, you're due for some surprises. You'll see her as a gay comedienne, psychopathic killer, and sophisticated glamor gal. In Androcles she plays the classic Shaw comedy so sexily that her leading man, Vic Mature, was moved to blurt one day as she strolled on the set in a gossamer gown, "Here comes the Barbara Payton of the Old Vic!"

It is true that Jean has handled both Shakespeare and Shaw with the greatest of ease before she'd turned 20, and collected four international film awards in the process. But she has also acquired a delightfully sexy face and figure, and a warm personality full of nerve and good sportsmanship.

Starting Beautiful But Dangerous for instance, Jean spent all one chill day being thrown into the icy mountain waters of the San Gabriel River. Beginning The Murder, she got her face slapped by Bob Mitchum's big paw all morning, and afternoon, for a bruised jaw but no complaints. And pushing off on Breakup she tumbled backwards from a ladder—the toughest stunt of all movie falls—scorning a double. It's a small wonder that when Jean departed from RKO a few weeks ago a hard bitten crew trio named "Army," "Sarge" and "Neal" sniffled like babies to see her go, thereby earning the tag of "The Mildew Sisters." But the tribute they paid Jean Simmons was even more sharp. "There hasn't been a gal like her around here," they swore, "since Carole Lombard." As any studio worker knows, that's the supreme compliment in Hollywood.

OF course, once a Hollywood star or pair of stars gets stuck with a legend any happenstance within sight or sound can be twisted to fan it along. It's been the Grangers' bad luck that since their wedding day, and even before, misinterpreted situations and events have unreeled to picture Jean Simmons as a pretty innocent, tragically abused.

One morning, for example, when Jean Simmons showed for work her eyes were red and puffy, obviously from weeping. The same morning her leading man had a difficult scene to make and asked for a closed set. Closed set, puffed eyes—the gossips caught that quick. That evening the Grangers read, to their surprise: "Jean Simmons was so upset from a battle with her husband the night before that she cried all day throughout her scenes." That she had. But crying scenes happened to be her job—both that day and the day before, and Jean is not the kind of actress who weeps glycerin tears.

There was the time after Jean's last birthday when Stewart bought her a small silver-gray Jaguar roadster and then, because she hadn't driven in Los Angeles' murderous traffic, he stuck at the wheel himself until Jean got her confidence. That rang out the news that: "Jean Simmons smashed up Stewart Granger's car and now he won't let her drive hers." Actually, Stewart sold his car to buy Jean's. It wasn't smashed by his wife or anyone.

If they go to Mocambo, don't hold hands, don't kiss, don't snuggle in a dance—which they'd never do in public—then: "The Stewart Grangers looked unhappy and sullen." Or when they enter LaRue and Stewart steers his wife to a table with a pat on the back, it's: "Stewart Granger spanked his wife in public." The night at Charles Vidor's party for Aly Khan, when Jean danced with Rita's prince for a long time, it was reported that: "Stewart Granger watched jealously every move they made." Jean's husband watched, it's true, but it wasn't jealousy, just pure fascination and as far as he could see there weren't many moves. "I can't understand," he told her later, "how you can dance that long and still not cover more than two yards of floor-space!"

Even as personal and sentimental a pledge as an engagement ring was good for headlines with the Grangers. Stewart gave Jean her enormous diamond in New York where she was appearing with Trio. When she sailed back to England, customs impounded it; that is, unless she wanted to pay a fabulous duty. Nothing could be more normal for a foreign bought bauble brought to any land—but the way the reports read you'd have thought Stewart was trying to smuggle in gems on his fiancée's fingers.

The child bride-aging Lochinvar stories are just as silly. It is perfectly true that Jean Simmons met Stewart Granger when she was a tender 16. But at that age she was already pretty mature. She had already been acting for two years, been in ballet school before that, and had lived through the big London blitz to boot. She didn't marry Granger until four years later, during which time they carried on a courtship which was fully approved by both families. Girls get married at 20 and earlier everyday in America. And, while an age-gap of 15 years between marriage partners is not ideal, things often work out very well—as they have with the Grangers, and incidentally with their best friends, Michael Wilding and Elizabeth Taylor.

Their wedding in Tucson, Arizona, two years ago this December, was intriguingly hush-hush—but again through no fault of Stewart or Jean's. That was arranged by Howard Hughes, then dickering for Jean's contract. It was his idea to waft them mysteriously to that desert city away from the prying press. They were dropped down in a city they'd never seen, and rolled up to a strange house whose owner they never met. Everything was there—flowers, champagne, preacher and witnesses—but the only person either member of the wedding knew was best man Michael Wilding who'd flown out from New York in response to their urgent telegram. After those bewildering nuptials, Stewart and Jean spent their brief honeymoon at an Arizona inn where a bodyguard patrolled to keep reporters and photographers at a distance. Such secrecy, of course, only launched a lot of dreamed-up yarns, and started the cloak-and-dagger legends of the Grangers' married life, wherein pale little flower-like Jean was trampled under Stewart's heavy boot.

The truth is, Jean Simmons is one of the most deceptive dolls in Hollywood. Although daintily molded, she cuts the water like a fish, bats a whistling tennis ball, water skis, and could dance all night. Her sporting blood comes naturally because her father was a physical education teacher, and she started ballet lessons as a kid of 12. Nothing pale or pallid suits her in any department. Two oil portraits of her by the French artist, Domergue, hang on Stewart Granger's bedroom walls today. They were painted simultaneously and they show two completely different women. One is a mature, sophisticated actress; the other a tousle-headed girl with an elfin face and mischievous, laughing eyes. Both are packed with color and both are Jean Simmons, at times. But the impish girl is the Jean that Stewart Granger knows best, loves, lives with and looks after.

Once, before they were married, Stewart snagged a couple of tickets for a play-off game between the Yankees and the Boston Red Sox, and proudly told Jean he would take her to the very special contest. "You'll see Joe DiMaggio and Ted Williams," he bragged.

"Oh?" she cooled him down. "I met Joe DiMaggio last night and Ted Williams—he's the quiet chap who reminds me of Gary Cooper, isn't he? They gave me tickets and both promised to hit home runs for me today." Which they did—Joe hit one and Ted two—while Stewart watched crestfallen, his thunder stolen.

The Grangers have been diamond fans ever since, and one of Jean's prized po-sessions is a baseball which Leo Durocher had the Giant team autograph for her. They seldom miss a game when the Hollywood team plays at home, screaming in overplayed British, "Oh, jolly good show—well played, topping, I say!" when their team makes a score, and, "Rum go! Hard Cheese!" etc., when the ump calls one foggy. They're ringside regulars too at the Hollywood Legion fights, where Jean sometimes slips down in her seat if the blood starts to fly, but usually yells as loud as her old man. The only thing she can't take is bull fighting. Down in Tiajuana, Mexico, to see Aruzza not long ago, Jean had to desert the ring when the matadors yanked out their swords.

BUT everywhere else a shrinking violet portrait of Mrs. Granger obviously doesn't suit her true style any more than the likeness of a truculent ogre becomes Mr. G. In fact, behind the innocent facade of Jean's round little face lurks a high humor and a ready wit which is sometimes cutting.

A while back, RKO's publicity chief called. "So and so," he informed her, naming a powerful columnist, "is calling from New York. She has a story that you're pregnant. Are you?"

"No," answered Jean. "Anything to say?" he pressed.

"No," she repeated. "Oh, yes I do. I'm not pregnant but my poodle, Bess, is. Just tell her she's got the wrong pup." Only she didn't say "pup."

That's exactly the kind of thing Stewart Granger himself comes up with, when the ridiculous humor of a situation strikes him. You ask either of the Grangers a silly question—and you get a silly answer, no matter who you are.

Stewart Granger is a Scot' who, in many ways, is as surprising and contradictory as his wife, Jean Simmons. He is not tactful. He is somewhat of a ham. He is hard-headed enough to argue a script or a scene with a producer or director when he thinks he's right, but there's yet to be a director or producer who calls him poison. He can drive a good business deal.

But Stewart is also an impractical romantic with a lusty hunger for life and adventure, a blithe spirit, an indestructible sense of humor and—believe it or not—a great tenderness. Physically, he is strong, six-three and all muscle; probably, by all male standards, the most handsome creature in Hollywood. Frankly, he is more handsome a man than Jean is a beautiful woman, which is really beside the point, since there is nothing on Granger's record to show he ever operated as a lady killer. In fact, one typically Hollywood item his needlers have been forced to pass up is this: Stewart Granger has never looked romantically at another woman besides Jean Simmons since he married her.

On the contrary, seeking he-man thrills has been and still is Stewart's prime hobby. He's the kind of character whose idea of a jolly good time is drilling a charging rhino at 30 paces, or sailing a boat in a tempest. In his hobbies he has exhibited little caution either as to his personal safety or the money they cost. He's had a country estate in England, "Watchers," where he raised horses and kept nine servants (which incidentally cost him less than a couple does in Hollywood). He's owned a yacht and he's made safaris in Africa—none of which are picayune projects. As a result, he's cheerfully used up all the money he's made seeking the good things of life. His money still runs through his fingers in the same dedicated chase. Although between them Jean and Stewart earn a small fortune each week when they work, he still refers happily to himself as "that broke actor from London"—but without a regret. A guy like that is seldom narrow or mean.

Jean Simmons, as a close friend says, worships Stewart. But their relationship, instead of being austere, is easy, humorous and bantering, in which Stewart delights to play an indulgent big brother role, and Jean a sort of callow kid sister. "If I call her 'Jean' or 'Darling,'" he's said, "you can be sure that I'm pretty sore at her. If it's 'you impossible little brat' we're having a wonderful time." "Pot-faced" days, as Stewart calls them, come along for the Grangers, of course, as with another pair who feel strongly about each other and therefore don't agree on everything. "After all," Jean will tell you, "we feel that marriage is two of the hardest parts ever played." But Jean plays it according to her natural character which, as another friend states, is that of "lover, not a fighter." Stewart plays his also naturally, as a love-protector; if sometimes he makes mildly like a guardian too, that's also natural with any husband who has lived a few more years than has his wife.

Not long ago Jean lost one of a pair of diamond-and-pearl earrings. A week or so went by before she remembered to report it to Stewart. "Give me the other," he said, "and I'll put in the insurance claim." She looked around. By then she'd lost it too. But if Stewart was exasperated at that girlish carelessness to the point of dealing her a swat on her levis, consider the way he gave the earrings and a few other prettys, including a gold watch, bracelet, etc, last Christmas time.

He'd collected the gifts and hidden them for the usual Christmas morning surprise. But on the eve of the 23rd, Jean came home from the studio "pot-faced" and miserable because of the confused state of affairs in her contract mixup. Stewart thought of the surprise up in his drawer and didn't wait for dates. He trotted them out to cure the blues. Then next day had to hustle out and get some more for the 25th.

So if that wicked Mr. Granger sometimes treats his wife like a little girl, it's because he loves her and is perpetually plotting to make her tawny eyes dance. In fact, the only big mistake that can be charged up to Stewart Granger, since he married Jean, was inspired by just such a warm desire. That is the Bel-Air house they've lived in and will soon sell because she doesn't like it, even though Stewart suspects cheerfully he will lose a small fortune in the deal.

Much has been written about the "Granger mansion" and Jean's lonely days in what is usually pictured as a cross between Xanadu and the House of Usher. Actually, the Grangers' Bel-Air house is no larger than the hundreds which surround it—some 12 rooms on two-and-a-half acres. Except for the fact that it could stand an escalator down to the pool, it's a mighty pleasant place.

Stewart bought that rashly (and paid plenty) to surprise and delight his bride. It was all furnished and apple-pie when he carried her in New Year's Eve two years ago. But the surprise didn't work. Jean has never felt the place fitted her or felt at home there. The decor and furnishings weren't hers. The place was too big, needed too many servants who were too hard to keep, and she doesn't like servants anyway. Besides, about the minute they moved in, her career troubles began. So in her mind there's been a private hoodoo connected with the big place, although the dismal picture of Jean Simmons brooding alone there in echoing chambers beside a lonely fire is really overdoing it to a ridiculous degree.

It's true that a few weeks after they moved in "Jimmy," as she calls him, left on location and then flew off to Italy for The Light Touch, but at that point Jean was busy preparing for Androcles And The Lion. Too, she had as houseguests Peter Bull, Peter Glenville and Glenn Smith, three of Stewart's visiting British buddies, to keep her company, besides the Grangers' circle of Hollywood-settled London pals, Deborah Kerr and Tony Bartley, James and Pamela Mason, and others. "If you can be lonesome with three handsome young men as houseguests, I have no sympathy," Stewart Granger kidded Jean when he got back. As a matter of fact the houseguests did come in handy. Jean put them all to work cleaning rugs, polishing floors and washing windows for Jimmy's return.

THE Grangers' new house is tiny compared to the first one, only two bedrooms, but just what they've always wanted, and they found it by poking around and peeking in windows until the nervous owners were practically forced to sell to get rid of the Grangers whom, by the way, they'd never heard of. And this one both Jean and Stewart like.

It sits atop a small mountain peak at the head of Coldwater Canyon with a circular view overlooking half of Southern California. Built by the famous architect, Byrd, it's a modern ranchhouse with big glass windows for the view and a large enough living room to handle the Augustus John and Matthew Smith paintings, the Tang horses and the Rodin and Epstein sculptures they've collected. Already Stewart has added a round swimming pool and a lanai. It took six months for Stewart to hustle around buying the expensive Robsjohns Gibbings modern furniture, choosing the drapes and such, which Jean, being busy at last, let him handle because he's artistic and loves that sort of thing anyway. "He picks them, I just criticize," she says, but Stewart has a different view. "If Jean doesn't like my selections," he explains, "we compromise. I take them back." Right now, everything's perfectly appointed except the bedrooms. They've got army cots in those.

The new place is even more isolated than the old one and the Grangers will live there—minus the servants—in about the same pleasant manner that they always have. That's casual style, with Stewart in slacks and T-shirt and Jean in blouse and jeans—and both of them usually padding barefooted about the place. Some nights they'll play canasta, read or watch TV and hit the hay early. "Just as dull as we're supposed to be," grins Stewart. Others, they'll roll down the hill in the Jaguar to the movies, some sports event, or to put Jean on a roller coaster at the Ocean Park Pier while Stewart tries to talk her out of just one more ride—she's a fiend for the things. On some week ends Stewart will fly off fishing down in Mexican waters and Jean will do nothing whatever. On others, there'll be pool parties where "The Chums"—almost all the British colony and a few native Hollywooders—will gather in sport clothes while Stewart hustles the barbecue food, because Jean can still barely fry an egg successfully. There'll be very few full dress Hollywood parties, and practically no night clubs if Stewart can help it, although sometimes just to keep Jean happy, he'll shuffle around a floor.

Really, if there's one valid criticism of the Stewart Grangers in Hollywood it's that they stick too close to their British friends. Outside of Sam Zimbalist and Mary Taylor, the Sidney Franklins and scattered others, they have few intimates who don't hail from home. But both Stewart and Jean are far from being snooty Red Coats looking down their British noses on their colonial cousins. In fact, to both of them America is a dream come true, a fascinating, if often bewildering land of milk and honey which they've just begun to digest. For the London girl who spent much of her youth diving under a billiard table as the buzz-bombs crashed, and who still gets the chills and jingles when she hears a fire siren, who never spied a banana until she was grown up and went to the Fiji Islands to make Blue Lagoon, Jean still has to pinch herself occasionally to be sure the abundance around her is real.

THE fabulous Farmer's Market is still the Grangers' favorite prowling place. The first time they visited it, right after their marriage, they went a little wild, piled up a cart with butter, eggs, tea, coffee, and things that are still rationed in Britain, even though they were stopping at a hotel then and had to give it all away. Jean still goes on perfume and soap binges, feeling guilty every time, and eats her morning toast dipped in bacon grease, from long austerity habits.

Just the same, it will seem good to return to England for Christmas, a dream the Grangers cherish at present, which may or may not work out. Because Young Bess, the picture MGM held for Jean two and a half years, will be shooting right up until about then and they may not have time to shave off Jimmy's beard and still make the plane. That's the first Granger family film duet in Hollywood, and Jean plays the role she's wanted all her life—young Queen Elizabeth, with dyed red hair and all. Stewart's Tom Seymour, who loses his head, both figuratively and literally, over his queen. "I'm the love of her youth, but not her young lover," he points out carefully. "Her old lover—just as in real life."

So, with her contract squabbles settled at last, her American debut set, doing a movie with the man she loves, living in a thrilling new house, and with other exciting events blossoming around her—such as a pregnant poodle and a red-headed hair-do, life assumes a rosy outlook at last for Jean Simmons in Hollywood. In fact, there's no reason at all why her second wedding anniversary, this December 20, shouldn't be a banner event—if only somebody would sail that tattered Little-Red-Riding-Hood-and-the-Big-Bad-Wolf story into the wastebasket where it belongs.

Both Jean and Stewart Granger have families in England for whom they're very homesick and hundreds of friends, too. And those things, hammered out in Hollywood long enough, get believed back home. Only the other day Stewart's mother wrote asking him, "What's happening to you children over there, anyway? Is something the matter?"

THERE'S nothing the matter. After all, the Grangers have broken no laws, flouted no traditions, landed in no jail, nor got drunk, nor insulted anyone's mother. On the contrary, they've worked hard, made hits, tended to their own knitting, kept out of private scandal. If they are individualistic, free-wheeling, and independent—well, that's what America stands for, isn't it? Stewart Granger, being Scotch and Jean Simmons being English, are not the kind who will ever transmit their deepest feelings to anyone but each other. But I, for one, believe them when they smile, "We're really not mad at anyone—including each other."

So right about now, since all is calm and all is bright for Jean Simmons and her Jimmy, too, perhaps a little peace on earth and good will to the Grangers might be in order around Hollywood. It's that time of the year.

"N-no," he agreed, hurrying down the hall. "I can see that you won't—"

After the door closed, Mr. and Mrs. Anthony Curtis sank back to the floor and howled. Then Tony had an awful thought. "You know, Jan," he said, "we've got to watch ourselves. I'll bet that guy goes right out and tells everyone he meets that Tony Curtis is stark, staring, and out of his mind!"

"Well?" asked his wife, "aren't you?"

Despite his reasonable fears, to date no one has tabbed Tony Curtis for the looney-bin—although the Curtises have been recklessly routed to the divorce courts, lavish apartments and maternity hospitals by various weirdly dreamed up reports. Now after a year-and-a-half's experience as Hollywood's most spotlighted couple, sometimes Tony and Janet are inclined to think a nice, quiet padded cell might be a cozy and peaceful retreat.

"It started off crazy," says Tony, "—this marriage of ours, and it's still that way. But," he adds, "Janet and I are a little crazy, too. Maybe that's why we're still happy though married in Hollywood."

It was just 18 months ago this December that Tony Curtis and Janet Leigh jittered nervously around Greenwich, Connecticut, waiting two hours for their nuptial ceremony, because Jerry Lewis had taken a sleeping pill and couldn't wake up in time. Then, after a jet-propelled three-day honeymoon in Manhattan, Tony had to run away on a picture junket with another girl, Piper Laurie. Janet traveled all by her lonesome home to Hollywood where there wasn't a home. When the lovebirds finally located a nest there wasn't anything to feather it with until Marge and Gower Champion came to their rescue with an emergency shower one Sunday afternoon. They grabbed the loot—towels, blankets, pillowcases and sheets—and used them that night when they moved in, whether Emily Post approved of their indelicate haste or not.

SINCE that hectic start Mr. and Mrs. Anthony Curtis have collected—besides household necessities—a variegated assortment of worldly goods. One .22 rifle, two sets of German electric trains, one model submarine, two sets of golf clubs, four cameras, a brace of fencing foils, pair of boxing gloves, two French painting outfits, a piano, a TV-phonograph combo, two '51 Buicks, a toy French poodle, a king-sized bed and, as Tony puts it, "a very low bank account." They've also assembled a total of nine hit pictures between them—six for Janet and three for Tony—a case of shingles (for Janet) and hives (for Tony). But most memorable of all, and peculiarly precious to the Curtises, are the dizzy days that have piled up in those 550-odd they've lived as man and wife. And they seem to get dizzier and dizzier as time goes by.

Take the other morning, for instance. Janet awoke with the birds, gave a motherly pat to her mate's crinkled noggin dug deep and dreamless in the pillow, stepped out of bed and slipped on her pink chenille robe. Pattering carefully to the door for the morning paper, she pulled it open, gasped, "Oh!" and bounced back in surprise.

A disheveled 15-year-old girl with red-rimmed eyes extended the folded sheet. "Here's your paper, Mrs. Curtis," she said. "Now can I have your autograph, please?"

"What are you d-doing here?" stuttered Janet and then recovered. "It's rather early, don't you think?" she said as she scribbled her name.

"I want your husband's, too," stated the girl.

"Sh-h-h-h-h," cautioned Mrs. C. "My husband's asleep."

After Janet cooked her breakfast, she tip-toed out past the girl who had curled up in the hall and was now fast asleep. Should she go back, wake and warn Tony? No—he liked to sack in, she was late for work at MGM, and the girl would probably soon wake and drift off. A few hours later, a bright and chipper, shaved and showered Tony opened the door. He looked down, and froze.

"A body!" he gasped. With visions of cops, district attorneys, and headlines Tony bent down and looked again. She was breathing, and in her hand was the tell-tale autograph pad. Reassured, he lightly hurdled the sleeping form and was on his way. But that was only the start.

On her way into the studio, Janet encountered a bunch of fans who swarmed over her gushing, "Oh, Janet—we just know you and Tony are going to have the prettiest baby ever. When is it due?"

"What baby?" asked Janet.

They giggled, "Oh, you know."

"I don't know," sighed Janet, just a little sore. "I wish I did."

Tony had his own problems. First, he dropped by a male beauty joint to get himself a permanent wave for this Houdini thing. A second blow to his nerves, but he assured himself it was all for art's sake. At the studio they sealed him in a packing box and dropped it into a brimming tank of water. After they dredged him up he wobbled dripping to the phone to call Janet about a family matter. He told her that the low offer they'd made on a bigger apartment had been turned down. He considered that this was just as well because they had expenses enough already.

But on the set of A Steak For Connie where Janet lifted the receiver, eager ears heard her explode dramatically, "But Tony—I want to live in luxury! I'm a Hollywood star, aren't I? Think of my public. What's a few thousand dollars? It's only money isn't it?"

And at Paramount's end of the wire Tony cried, "You're so right, darling! Let us live recklessly, expensively, dangerously. I'll write the check even if it bounces." What that conversation really said of course, was, "Okay, let's skip it and stay where we are." But by nightfall one gossip column carried the news that Tony Curtis and Janet Leigh were "really in on the loot these days. They're moving into the swank, expensive Shoreham." Another queried, "Have Tony and Janet at last gone Hollywood?" Before the publicity offices closed, four magazines had put in requests for layouts of the Curtises in their new home!

They got together for dinner that evening at Chasen's and toying over a cocktail waiting for the lamb chops Janet lit a cigarette. "Put out that cigarette!" snarled Tony with his best Svengali leer.

"I'll smoke if I want to!"

"—and drop that drink!"

"You Brute!" hissed Janet.

"D-r-r-r-op it, I say! Sit up straight, fold your hands—and s-m-i-l-e!"

Janet dabbed her eyes tragically. "I've had enough," she breathed hoarsely. "You beast, you fiend! I'm going home to Mother."

Just then the waiter steamed up with the entrée. Mr. and Mrs. Curtis fell happily to their sheep bones after Tony had grinned, "Love me?" and got his laughing reply, "Love you." But when they got home the phone buzzed impatiently.

"Hello, Tony," said a columnist. "I'm printing tomorrow that you and Janet are splitting up. I thought it would be the nice thing to do to let you confirm it."

"Gee, thanks," said Tony, "sweet of you—what? Splitting up? Get outa here!" And slammed down the receiver. "How do you suppose," he asked Janet with a gasp of amazement, "people get crazy impressions like that?"

They finally got to bed, only to be routed out at midnight by a sloppy-joed miss on a scavenger hunt. They gave her a celery stalk. At three A.M. Jerry Lewis called from the east saying he couldn't rouse Patti and was worried. They took care of that and called him back. Things were really very peaceful until about 5:52 when Janet awoke with the house rocking, the china tinkling, the pictures flapping on the wall. She dived for Tony. "Earthquake!" she screamed. He only yawned and mumbled, "Just a settling shock, honey—or maybe just another rumor about the Curtises going round."

THE above saga is a fairly accurate sample of a 24-hour-span in the married life of Mr. and Mrs. Tony Curtis of Hollywood, and if you think it's confused and crazy you're only agreeing with Tony. But when Tony says "crazy" he usually means "wonderful" at the same time. That's how it is with "Tona-la" and "Tzc-a-la", as they call each other when nobody's around. Those are private endearment terms. Another one that influences their lives is "schtick-lok" meaning those crazy bits of business which Tony and Janet swing into at the slightest provocation, or even without it.

The strait-jacket scene was a schtick-lok, and so was the phone talk, and that Svengali scene at Chasens, too. They're seizures of impromptu nonsense that attack Tony and Janet Curtis because both are high humored, volatile characters, because both need a constant escape valve for the steam that their double movie pressured lives build up. The truth is, the Curtises can't resist schtick-loks any more than a kid can pass up candy, although they know that because of them a lot of those crazy marriage rumors which swirl about their heads are nobody's fault but their own.

But behind all the funny business there's a mutually devoted marriage as solid as Gibraltar's rock, although, admittedly not quite as serene. In fact, if you level down sensibly with Tony and Janet on the subject of rumors, and the more general subject of placid domesticity in Hollywood, Tony Curtis will shake his handsome head and grin, "Sure, I'm having trouble with my wife. But," he'll add, "she's having trouble with me, too. And you know why? Because we really love each other!"

If you think that's a cockeyed contradiction, Janet Leigh doesn't. She backs him right up, because neither member of that team has anything to hide. "Of course we have our disagreements and sometimes we have our fights," she'll say. "Who hasn't? I'll tell you who hasn't—people who don't live and love. Couples who don't care enough about each other to work up a real concern. Marriages where there's nothing there to raise a notch of blood pressure on either side of the house. Marriages that are dead and dull. And that's not Tony's and mine!"

It certainly isn't. Around last Valentine's day, for instance, Janet was going through the clothes in Tony's closet, which as anyone knows, is extremely risky business for any wife. But Patti Lewis had asked her to go horseback riding and she wanted a vest. Tony had eight sport vests (he collects them) and pretty soon Janet picked just the right one. As she hauled it out and started to try it on, she felt an object in the pocket. Eve had trouble with curiosity and Mrs. Curtis is one of her daughters. She pulled it out, unwrapped the tissue—and there was a beautiful lady's cigarette lighter engraved on the top, "To My Love."

"H-m-m-m-m," said Janet, puckering her brow. All afternoon she wondered. It was completely unreasonable, of course, but any psychologist will tell you that a normal amount of jealousy is an integral part of love. That night when Tony breezed in he could tell right away something was wrong.

"What's the matter?" he asked.

"Oh, nothing."

"Yes it is."

Then Janet blurted it out: "Who did you buy that lighter for?"

"What? Why, why—" The guy was stunned. Then light broke and he exploded. "You beautiful, you dumb, you darling, you stupid, you impossible dame! So you've got to snoop through everything I own! And you've got to pick the one safest hiding place in this house—a vest I haven't worn for two years! Who is it for? Three guesses! But just for that you're not gonna get it!" She didn't either, not until enough days had passed for Tony to have certain alterations made in the engraving, which testified beyond any doubt that the pretty was for nobody but his wife, Janet Leigh.

THAT's the kind of sure love symptom a wise story teller named O. Henry could have made something out of. So is what happened in Paris last year, where Tony and Janet celebrated Christmas on their European tour. They had ten wonderful days in Paree poking around for paintings on the Left Bank, sipping vermouths in sidewalk cafes, and exercising Tony's "fractured French" on the taxi drivers. One night, leaving a little Russian restaurant to visit an artist's apartment, they strolled through the old Seine section and in a tiny jeweler's window Tony spied a pair of old gold cufflinks (his weakness) which drove him out of his mind. But the place was closed. Janet made mental notes of landmarks and counted her steps.

Next morning, while Tony snoozed peacefully, she slipped out of the room, hailed a fiacre, jumped out at the landmark and paced off the steps until she arrived at the obscure little shop, haggled and bought the beauties. It was pushing noon before she got back and Tony was pacing the hotel room. He demanded to know just where the blue blazes she'd been.

"Out for a stroll," lied Janet, "getting some air."

"You're out getting air when we've got a million things to do!" blew up her mate. "Christmas shopping and Lord knows what-all. Heaven help me, I have married an idiot!" But Janet didn't mind. She had her secret. Christmas morning when Tony discovered it—well, he could have cut out his tongue.

If Tony and Janet Curtis live to celebrate their Golden Wedding Day they will undoubtedly still encounter mix-ups like those because two deeply devoted, emotional characters like them will never change. But meanwhile the marital adjustments of two attractive opposites go on day by day, settling their union more securely, but with little after-shocks as Tony chuckles, "just like that earthquake."

It's a little hard right now to imagine any girl tossing Tony Curtis out, but as Tony frankly points out, he was far from housebroken to model husbandry when he married Janet Leigh. Nor, he'll also confess, is he yet. But there's progress.

"I was a real Bohemian," he confesses, "just a big, healthy slob doing what I liked. If I got hungry, I ate; if I got sleepy, I slept. If I wanted to get up at four A.M. and go swimming, I went. If I had a buck, I spent it. No rules, no order, nobody else to consider in my habits. That doesn't work when you're married," he grins. "That's why sometimes we seem a little crazy—even to each other."

That's the truest of talk from Tony Curtis. Because these differences in Janet and Tony stem straight from the contradictory slants you'd get as a free-wheeling, self-reliant tough kid roaming the Bronx—and a small town, Stockton, California, girl with set social patterns of ordered life. On top of that, Tony went through a war in the Navy to make him even more footloose-minded while Janet has undoubtedly accented her yearnings for stability because her first marriage was so unstable and helter skelter. But strangely enough, some of Tony and Janet's other early problems have been actually the same, although what they've reaped from encountering them are two totally different outlooks. Take money, which is an important item in any home. I remember talking that over with them one day.

"It's funny," said Janet thoughtfully, "how not having any money has affected Tony and me in completely different ways. Because I never had any I'm cautious, careful and thrifty about it. I worry about the bank balance. I want to pay my bills by return mail. Mrs. Cash-and-Carry, that's me. I'm Scotch, you know; maybe I'm tight. Anyway, I got in debt from a business venture with my first husband and it took me two years to pay off. That scared me. The other day, I saw a woman working hard at a small job right in this studio. Once, she was a star making $2,500 a week, in the silent movie days too when you could pile it up and keep it. But she didn't save and now—"

"There you go," shrugged Tony, "a 25-year-old girl thinking like a 55-year-old woman. Now it's different with me. I was brought up to value myself, not a buck. I have no money vices. I don't gamble or throw it away. I hardly ever carry any of the stuff with me. But if I want a new suit and it's a $150 and I want to pay $50 a month to get it, why not? I'm not conscience-stricken. If I get a $30 pair of shoes and I want them, I buy them. I deserve them. I work hard for my money and so does Janet. Why shouldn't she buy that new Adrian dinner gown if she likes it and can use it?"

"Because," Janet answered him, "we can't afford it and I don't have a right to it. We could trade in our cars, too, and get a Cadillac—but we don't rate a Cadillac."

"Why not?" countered Tony, tossing his hands in the air. "Now, I don't need a Cadillac and I don't want one. But if I did there's nothing in the world to keep us from getting one if we can swing it. I'm not afraid of debts, because I'm banking on myself. I owe money now. Owe some to Janet I borrowed when my dad was sick. Owe some more for a $50,000 contract suit I settled for $4,000. But so what? I'm not worried. I'm young and healthy, and so's my gal!"

Actually Tony and Janet Curtis have no real money worries. They make enough, Janet at present more than Tony. They have formidable expenses and responsibilities, both of them, but they're getting along. Actually, too, Tony's no more a spendthrift than Janet's a miser. On a lot of things, in fact, he's closer with a buck than she is. The other day when a model submarine he bought and launched in Jerry Lewis' swimming pool sank to the bottom, Tony was outraged. He wrote the manufacturer demanding his money back or a new sub. It had cost all of $13. As for Janet Leigh's Scotch blood—you should see the watches, rings, cufflinks, tie clasps and things with which she's gifted the man she loves.

THERE is still no predicting events at "the Boarding House" it's true, but as Tony says, "we're simmering down slowly to a rational life," and Janet sighs, "at least we have meals to eat at specified hours and a maid to cook them." In fact, since starting Houdini together, with the same working hours, they feel like solid, respectable citizens.

There are still six keys out to their apartment. "All of them to men, not one girl, darn it," Tony complains. Among the men are Jerry Lewis, Danny Arnold, his funny-business writer, and Jerry Gershwin, the MCA representative who keeps track of The Monster. That pack of clowns, aided and abetted by some others, including one named Curtis, are likely to turn the Curtis menage into a three-ring circus at any hour of the day or night.

Coming home from a movie the other evening, Janet and Tony found Jerry Gershwin and his girl sitting on the floor watching television while Danny Arnold bounced on the sofa acting out some insanity gags he'd dreamed up for Jerry over the phone to New York. "Are we intruding?" inquired Janet politely. "Would we be awfully in the way if we came in?"

"Please don't worry your pretty heads about it," they were assured. "You kids are always welcome. We like you. Make yourself at home. Use anything you want."

Janet really adores such mad surprises and the individuals who create them, because she owns an oversized funny-bone herself and is happiest when the zany chums swoop down and charge up the joint. But even when she's there with only Tony, Janet Leigh is conditioned by now to all sorts of rather rugged moments as the loving wife of a guy who gets lost in his screen jobs to the point of schizophrenia.

For months after The Prince Who Was A Thief and throughout Son Of Ali Baba, swords, sabres and scimitars whistled around their small apartment at the risk of life, limb, and the overstuffed pieces. Then Tony turned into a ring punchy making Flesh And Fury. He shadow boxed, skipped rope, taped his hands, batted his nose and trotted up and down Wilshire Boulevard doing road work in a pair of gym trunks. Since this Houdini business began—with both of them mixed up in the magic—Janet's had so many hoops passed over her body that she feels like a beautiful barrel.

Sometimes Janet thought she'd go off her rocker too if she had to "pick another card," when she's already picked at last forty-million. But the truth is she's really as wrapped up in Tony's interests, career and otherwise, as he is, and if he wants to saw her in half or nail her in a coffin and drop her over Niagara Falls, that's jake with her.

THE real hassles of the Curtis married life are much less spectacular—just the tiny clashes of daily living habits which any married man and maid who have progressed beyond the honeymoon stage will recognize at once.

Janet, for example, is convinced that Tony is undernourished and living off of a diet designed for pellagra.

When she scats away before he does she leaves notes by the breakfast table: "Eat this and eat all of it—or don't come home tonight!"

"Man, it's murder!" grumbles Tony, "to Janet a lunch isn't a lunch unless it's at noon; and a dinner isn't a dinner unless it's at seven—no matter how much I eat in between. She likes a farmhand breakfast, I can't eat eggs that early—and so I'm headed for rickets!"

There's the sleeping business—Janet's a six-hour girl, Tony's a 14-hour boy in the hay. Just when he's sinking into a cozy coma, she hears a rooster crow and gets up, soft footing it around but making enough commotion to penetrate his sleepy head. "Sometimes I could heave a shoe at her," Tony will grin, "but I haven't yet. Just maybe a slipper." And there's dancing—it's ecstasy for Janet but Tony doesn't dig the light fantastic on a crowded floor. And movies—Tony likes swash-bucklers, fight pictures and murder mysteries; Janet goes for romance. You like coffee and I like tea. Janet's tidy, Tony's not...

The other afternoon Tony was reading. "Honey," he called, "can I have a glass of water?"

"Sure," said Janet, and brought him one. He took a sip and set it down, read on a while and reached for the glass. It wasn't there.

"Hey," yelled Curtis, "where's my glass?"

"Why, it's washed and put in the cupboard where it belongs," announced his wife.

"It doesn't belong there when I'm still drinking out of it!" reasoned Tony.

That night he hung up his sport shirt on a chairback by the bed. Next morning he reached his hand over for it. No shirt. "Where's my shirt?" he cried.

"In the laundry, of course," he got back.

Well, he's learning, as all husbands do. He's getting trained. "And I really don't mind," Tony confesses, "cause I love her so. Why, I even fill the cigarette lighters now and all kinds of things. Maybe I let a butt linger a minute or two in the ash-trays but honest," he laughs, "once we get our own house Janet won't fuss about little things like that. She'll have so much to do she won't have time to. Right now I let her revel in her household chores, let her get carried away with 'em. If it makes Janet happy—why not?"

Actually, both Tony Curtis and Janet Leigh know they couldn't live at this point without each other. If any doubts about that ever hung around they vanished up in the Rocky Mountains around their first wedding anniversary one day last June.

Janet was making The Naked Spur near Durango, Colorado, so Tony, who was free then, traveled there to celebrate the sentimental milestone with his bride. One day, when Janet rolled away with the picture company for some mountain shots, Tony hopped off the bus along the way with his trout rod. They arranged to meet at the same place in the evening, when the company came home.

At dusk she had the driver let her off at the appointed spot saying, "Go on, I'll walk in with Tony." Only after she'd looked around—there wasn't any Tony.

The canyon was silent and the sun was sinking. The shadows stretched and the dark pines whispered. Something slithered in the grass, something moved behind a bush, something howled. Janet was scared.

She clambered down the cliff to the trumbing stream and stumbled along the boulders crying, "Tony! Tony!" She called and called and she got a little hysterical. All kinds of horrible speculations raced through her head.

THEN she finally saw him—a tiny figure in the distance, standing on a rock in the middle of rushing rapids. She got there somehow, wet and dripping, her shins scraped raw from the boulders, but she didn't feel that or care. She climbed frantically up on the rock and, crying and laughing at the same time, grabbed her guy.

"S-h-h-h-h, Jan!" Tony cautioned. "You'll scare him. He's right under this rock!"

"I don't care what's under it," she chattered. "I want what's on it!"

"That's me, all right," admitted her mate, "but I just crawled out from under this rock myself!"

So even in tender moments it's sometimes a little crazy with the Tony Curtises. But it's also pretty wonderful. That's the way it has been for almost two years now, and I suspect that's how it always will be—crazy but with plenty of wonderful love and lovely troubles, too. END

Not that I'm any prize haul myself. I have a temper to go with the color of my hair, and a lot of other faults which I won't enumerate because there isn't that much space. But when people want to know why I haven't found The Man, I can give them a lot of reasons.

The first date I ever had was a crunchy example. I was 11 and so was he, and when I asked Mom if he could take me to a movie she said yes. We were awfully young, but there wasn't any argument about it because our families were very friendly. He and I had gone to Sunday School together ever since we were old enough to know the truth about Santa Claus. It was a real date all right; he called for me and even paid my admission into the theater, but we'd no sooner sat down than he wanted to hold my hand. I thought the whole idea pretty silly—just a year ago we'd been breaking baseball bats over each other's heads—and with all the dignity I could muster, removed both hands from his reach. He managed, however, to get a thumb out of the collection, and held on to it with a death grip for more than two hours.

So you might say that my first date turned out to be a wolf, junior edition, and this type, junior or senior, has pervaded my life for the past ten years. A wolf isn't necessarily such a bad animal, but it's just the way they go about it. My first date, for instance, couldn't leave well enough alone. Two weeks later he invited me to a party, and when I got to his house I was immediately steered to a movie, where I paid my own way. I've always had a sneaking suspicion that it was his way of getting even with me.

THE idea that I liked men came to me pretty early in life. I suppose I imagined myself as sort of a huntress, because in adolescence I regarded every new date as an addition to my trophy room. This trophy room was purely mental, except perhaps for the little book in which these unsuspecting males got themselves recorded. I guess I was about 14 when I bought it and painstakingly inscribed on the first page, "The Men In My Life."

Half the "men" were under 16, and I ran out of pages by the time I reached high school. These were the days when I hadn't yet entered the world of Hollywood, and my dates were almost always my classmates, who in general continued in the same pattern.

There was one I was madly in love with. I used to walk out of my way in order to pass his house on the way to school, and sometimes he joined me. My strategy was particularly necessary because between his house and the school there lived a girl who had also set her cap for him, and I figured a two-block start on her was an outflanking maneuver. After I'd almost given up trying to win his admiration he finally asked me for a date. What happened? He brought his dog along. "Where I go," he said, "my dog goes." This was all right with me—I love dogs—but before the evening was over, Rover had bitten me twice.

Willie was one I didn't have to scheme for. He rode the same bus to junior high school, and he always stood up and gave me his seat and then carried my books for me. He was the perfect gentleman, but he was also fat as a squab and looked as though he might be my kid brother. He probably looks like Anthony Eden now, but then—well, a girl can't get romantic about a tub of lard wrapped up in knickers.

Willie's rival was a lanky, string-bean type of boy who followed me not only around school, but also in my neighborhood, which was far from his home. He never spoke to me, just followed in patient adoration. I felt awfully sorry for him, and one day stopped in my tracks and turned to face him. "Is there something I can do for you?" I said. He turned scarlet and swallowed until his Adam's apple was bobbing up and down like a yo-yo. "Why don't you come over to my house on Sunday afternoon?" I said. "We could play some records." He stammered an acceptance, and on Sunday showed up in a starched collar, his new suit and a pair of bright orange shoes that squeaked dismally when he walked. He didn't walk much; just sat in a straight, high-backed chair, and Mother and I spent two hours trying to draw some conversation out of him and make him feel at ease. It

■ Hi! You certainly don't have to ask "What's My Line?" because one look tells you. It was really wonderful when Modern Screen asked me to help with your Christmas shopping because if there is anything I like better than Christmas, it's Christmas shopping. It always reminds me of the time when I had a little gift shop of my own in New York. I loved finding those small accessories with such charm and individuality, they seemed to say "for someone special." Now that I'm Mrs. Martin Gabel, wife and mother, I resurrect the "Gift Shop" at the Yuletide Season and scout the town for unusual things for my family and friends.

This year on my treasure hunt, I discovered some truly wonderful jewelry and to make the presents even more attractive, I am using some lovely Christmas wrappings and trimmings from Dennisons of New York.

To avoid the last minute hustle and bustle, I started shopping early, combing the town to help you find gifts for your family and friends. Peter became so curious when I arrived home laden with bundles, that hiding them from him was quite a problem. After he was tucked in bed, I gave Martin a "sneak preview" of my booty and he was surprised that such beautiful gifts could be purchased for so little.

I know your friends will be as excited as mine if they should discover one of these charming gifts under their Christmas tree. Just order directly from the store mentioned below each picture—Merry Christmas and happy shopping!

didn't work; it was as though I had petrified him.

He was the only male on whom I had such a drastic effect. Most of my dates in Hollywood have taken me out a few times and then either joined the Army or married another girl. It's been more than three years now since I began working in pictures, and still my big moment hasn't shown his face. The selection of men in Hollywood is different only in that they are generally better looking and they drive flashier cars. But underneath, they are quite the same and present the same problem—that of meeting someone you like who returns the compliment.

I've gone out with a lot of men who aren't actors, but among the ones you'd know are Roddy McDowall, Tony Curtis, Vic Damone, Nicky Hilton, Ronnie Reagan, Dick Long, Scott Brady, Dick Anderson, an actor at MGM, and Jerry Paris, a New York actor. There's been Dick Contino and Jerome Courtland and Rock Hudson and Leonard Goldstein, the producer.

The Army took away Dick Long, who's now in Japan, and also Dick Contino and Vic Damone, who's just recently been released. Marriage took Jerome Courtland, Tony Curtis, and Ronnie Reagan. Scott and Rock are both wonderful men and fun to be with, but my dates with them have been mostly on suggestion from the publicity department, at premieres and so forth. Their interests lie elsewhere and there's been no thought of romance.

I still date Dick Anderson and Leonard Goldstein, and since the latter left Universal-International, my studio, I feel a lot easier about dating him because it used to be that every time I got a good role people thought it was because of his influence at the studio. Now when I make any progress there's no longer suspicion.

Some actors have a habit of talking shop from the time they call for a girl until they deliver her on her doorstep, and while I'm interested in the industry and its careers, I'd like a change of subject once in a while. Then there's Bill Thomas, a designer at the studio, and while Bill refrains quite admirably from his brand of shop talk, which is clothes, I can't help but get the feeling that he's sizing up and criticizing my clothes.

I won't deny that when I meet a man for the first time I size him up almost unconsciously as potential husband material. I think it's just instinct in every girl, and any female who claims to be above such thoughts is a first-rate fudger. Anyway I start summing them up, and then almost invariably there comes a hitch.

I recently met a man with a very forceful personality and right away I thought, "Here's somebody who's a real man and not a mouse!" Well, I went out with him about three times, and each time was like the last. He spent the evening making definite statements and then pounding on the table to emphasize the point that he was right, even if he was trying to prove that grass is really pink. You know the type—"I think this is the way it should be, and therefore this is the way it is."

Then I know a man who's the home-loving type. Every woman likes this kind of man, including my mother, who is always charmed by any man who tends to stay by the hearth. She's entitled to her own opinion, but I know that if I ever married this man, he would be choosing the wallpaper and arranging the furniture without even consulting me. And when I get married I like to think I'll be able to arrange the flowers and buy the face towels without any coaching.

Three years ago I went out with a man who was most attractive and a gentleman in every way. But he used to add up every dinner bill presented to him and usually argued with the waiter. He would figure the tip percentage down to the last nickel, and once he gave the boy at the Mocambo parking lot a quarter and asked for change. It would have been forgivable had he been on his financial uppers, but he was far from it. Now I don't approve of throwing money around carelessly, but I am embarrassed by unnecessary stinginess.

Not too long ago I was asked for a date by a man who had received a great deal of publicity around town. Through the grapevine I had heard about certain of his faults, but then he had his reputed good points, too, so I went out with him. It was the dulllest evening I have ever spent. He had two subjects of conversation; (a) how much money he had and (b) the kind of drinks he liked. The rest of the chatter was devoted to a strange brand of small talk which was even less than unimportant. We were with a group of his friends, and when I turned to them for something interesting it developed that they talked like he did. The only way I can describe it—well, they just uttered strange and senseless noises, that's all. Nothing made any sense, and although much of it might have had to do with their own private jokes, I was left out of it as though I'd been on the other side of a six-foot wall. I didn't know whether to chalk it up to rudeness or stupidity or both, but needless to say I didn't go out with him again.

SOMETIMES girls dream they'll bump into Mr. Right when they round a corner some day, or that a blind date will develop into the big romance. Me, I'd rather know who I'm going out with before I accept an invitation. A girl in movies gets a lot of unsolicited attention from men she has never met. They see her on the screen, and if they happen to know someone who knows her personally they get her address or phone number, even if they live in Abercrombie, Alaska. Sometimes it's embarrassing to turn them down, particularly when mutual friends are involved, but if a girl does accept she almost always finds the same type: Wolf. For months I received long-distance phone calls from a man, then when he came to Hollywood on business and phoned again, I told him I was too busy to see him. But then when he learned I was scheduled to appear in his city during a tour, he grew even more persistent. To put an end to it, I made a date with him. "Call for me at my hotel," I told him, and could almost hear him drooling over the phone. When he arrived in the lobby I was waiting for him, surrounded by five of my friends, who proceeded to spend the evening with us. His perpetual expression was of a man who has just been stabbed.

I think there used to be an advertisement by a garter company which claimed that a woman wouldn't marry a man whose socks wrinkled around his ankles. On the face of it that's a pretty silly objection, but then a man who isn't well groomed in one respect is apt to be sloppy in others as well. I notice immediately whether a man's shoes are shined, his suit pressed and his shirt clean. I don't mean to be fussy about details, but I figure if I spend a good hour grooming myself for him, he can do as much for me.

As I said before, I'm not perfect, and I guess I'm certainly incomprehensible when it comes to the things I like about a man. I do a complete switch when it comes to promptness, because I'm never on time myself. I appreciate that a man on time for an appointment is showing consideration for the other fellow, but me, I'd rather a man be a little late. I suppose my obsession is a hangover from one man I used to date who was as correct as a Swiss-made watch. If he was to call for me at seven, the doorbell used to ring just as the radio announcer was ringing his chimes. And of course, at that point, I was barely out of the tub. That's why I liked dating in Mexico. They get so sunstruck down there that life moves slowly, and it's the only time in my life I've been ready for an escort, who invariably arrived at least an hour late.

I like men who are honest, even honest to a fault. I'd rather a man tell me my new hat is a horror, if he thinks so, than lie to be polite about it. Several times I've dated a Hollywood actor who's a very amusing guy—a character, I suppose—but he comes right out with his opinions and sometimes offends people because of his frankness. I've never been offended, simply because I like his sincerity.

Sense of humor is one of the first things I notice about a man, and it has to be pretty weird to match my own. I suppose I shouldn't admit it, but I'm always the first to laugh when somebody falls down. It's a corny kind of humor but I can't help it, and unless people hurt themselves, I'm likely to go into hysterics. I like men who can take a joke on themselves, and I remember one swain who went down a few notches in my estimation when I found that he couldn't. He had brought me home after a lovely evening and was walking down our front steps toward his car when he stumbled. He kept trying to get his footing which resulted in his almost spinning down the walk and then going flat on his face. My girlish laughter could be heard all the way out in Brentwood, but he didn't think it was at all amusing.

Another thing that regulates my degree of admiration is the way a man reacts to animals. I don't expect him to get down on the floor and have a wrestling match with my dogs, but I do like to see him pay some attention. I recall the first time I went out with one man—we spent about 15 minutes in the living room before we left the house, and although my dogs were sitting quietly in front of him, begging politely for attention, he didn't so much as look at them.

Manners make a big difference, too. Of course, now it isn't like the old days, when a date often would sit outside the house and honk the horn when he arrived. (I just let him sit there and honk until he finally gave up and had to come to the front door.) I go out with older men now, men who are established in life and mannerly as a matter of course. I don't mind somebody using the wrong fork—I probably do that myself sometimes—but I do dislike rudeness to others.

IN MY early teens I used to "grade" the men entered in my little book, and it's fun to look through it now and see why I liked a boy or why I disliked him. It's surprising, too, how closely I still hew to the same ideas and ideals, even though I'm older and more sure of what I like and want. I remember the first boy who asked if he could kiss me. I was in junior high school, and I was so confused I thought I'd die on the spot. I finally managed to say I thought we were both too young, an astute observation if ever there was one. These days I'm a lot more sure of myself, sure of handling difficult situations and sure of what I want in a husband. Maybe I'm asking for the perfect man, and maybe I'll end up with somebody who squeezes nickels, beats dogs, lies like Paul Bunyan, and never smiles.

But then I'm a woman and have my prerogative and I can change my mind about all these ideas, and think he's the perfect man.

a report on lana and love

(Continued from page 30) making of plans and promises. In her room across the lake there was a newspaper. And in the paper there was a story with a Las Vegas, Nevada, dateline which said that Mrs. Fernando Lamas had been granted a divorce from her actor husband, and that Lamas was now free to marry the girl of his choice, Lana Turner, the MGM movie star. Lana sat in the boat and thought about it. All she had to do was row to the shore, walk into a Nevada court, ask for a divorce from her husband, Bob Topping, and then find a justice of the peace and say "I do" with Lamas, the man she was admittedly in love with. That would be the end of a story that had been in the papers a long time, ever since she had started making a film called The Merry Widow with Lamas more than a year before.

That was all it would take—but it was a bigger step than the world knew. And Lana had to think about it—all alone. Away from all disturbances and influences, Lana Turner was making up her mind—and they say she made up her mind to be smart this time. She was in love, but she was going to be smart.

In general appearance Lana Turner is not much different than she was 15 years ago when she made her first movie at Warner Brothers. Her figure, with the help of a little dieting in the past few years, is still as curvy and exciting as it was then. Her face is still the tantalizing thing it used to be, with large dark eyes and a sultry expression, a full mouth and that overall appearance of a pout. In personality she is more reserved, not nearly as vivacious, but she laughs like she used to and cries when she is unhappy. Only in her mind is she really different. A lot has happened. Lana has learned that happiness and success do not walk hand in hand and that love, true love, doesn't always come to a girl just because she is the toast of the most fabulous town in the world.

Lana learned about men—and love—the Hollywood high-pressure way. Rather reserved, she was not the busiest girl at Hollywood high school in the evenings. As a classmate of hers put it: "She was so doggone beautiful that none of the fellows dared ask her for a date. She had that cool attitude even then—and the guys didn't know how to cope with her." Even though one or two lads got close enough to discover there was warmth beneath the chill, Lana never had the warm, hand-holding awakening to romance that is every teen-ager's birthright. Instead she was plucked from a soda fountain stool, poured into a sweater, and projected life-size on a Hollywood screen.

Every man who watched that screen edged forward in his seat. From the back row came a resounding "WOW!" In a couple of hours the word had spread that the sexiest blonde in town was toiling at Warners—and the chase was on. And these hounds could cope . . . reserve or no reserve.

Any of the fellows who took her out in those early days will tell you that Lana was naive. She dated indiscriminately. She wasn't interested in the men, but in the places they took her and the times she was having. So she went out with anyone who promised something exciting and different in the way of entertainment. She was to be seen almost nightly at the Trocadero and the other fashionable night spots. One night it would be with a lad who could hardly dig up the price of the evening—and the next it might be a chap old enough to be her father. Lana was a gay one but certainly not romantic.

ARTIE SHAW was undoubtedly the first real love she ever had. Shaw was, at that time, the king of hot music. He was handsome and easy to be with. He was very literate. At any rate, a date with the clarinet player was filled with the promise of romance and intelligence—and Lana was no different from any other young girl of her age, she wanted Shaw, too. If you ask her today why she married him she will have difficulty explaining it to you, but at the time it seemed to be the thing she wanted most. She eloped on the spur of the moment and when the world woke up to its morning papers, Lana Turner was all over the front pages as the gal who got Shaw.

The marriage didn't last long. When it broke up as casually as it started, Lana Turner vowed she would never marry again; have more sense if she ever did; and stated that she had learned a lesson about love. Perhaps she thought she had.

As a grass widow Lana Turner lived her role to the hilt. She developed an expression of a mixture of complete concentration and adoration—and she seemed to turn it on every man she met. Her suitors flocked around by the score. There were tall ones, short ones, fat ones and old ones and they changed with the regularity of nightfall. It appeared that Lana was really earnest about staying away from love—except for casual explorations.

The newspapers, though, didn't believe her. Seldom a week passed by that her name wasn't linked romantically with one of the eligibles of the movies in the columns. Victor Mature was head man for awhile. This began at first as a publicity romance. Vic was coming ahead fast in the pictures and Lana was in the midst of a big sex build-up by MGM. Soon, though, Lana became more than a prop in the affair. She took a sincere liking to Vic—and then everything went wrong. One night, after a particularly bitter quarrel, she took off for San Francisco. Next morning Mature read headlines in the papers that stated: "Lana Turner To Marry Tony Martin."

Although this marriage never came off, Tony Martin was also one of Lana's sincere loves. She was completely captivated by the Martin male beauty and the way he crooned a love song. It is said that she was more jealous of Tony Martin than any man she ever loved. And she certainly clung to his good right arm at every opportunity.

Steve Crane, a Hollywood restaurant owner and erstwhile actor, was Lana Turner's second husband. Steve showed up in Hollywood out of nowhere and in a very short time, due no doubt to his good looks and quiet manner, became one of the most popular escorts in town. He met Lana at a party and, according to her friends, she fell completely in love with him on sight. Her later actions deny this, but that is the way the story goes. At any rate, before people knew what was happening, she had eloped again.

The early days of Lana's marriage to Steve Crane were properly idyllic. They lived normally. Fresh from the feverish pace of "bachelorhood," Lana seemed content to work her eight hours and come home to quiet evenings before a cozy fire. But this, too, vanished one day and the Cranes began to appear more often in public. People began to notice that Lana appeared restless. Steve was taken into the army shortly afterwards and absence didn't make Lana's heart grow fonder. A short time after his discharge, Steve Crane became Lana's second divorcé.

Unlike the more mature Artie Shaw, Steve Crane took the separation from his wife badly. Weeks of ineffectual tries at a reconciliation culminated in Steve driving his car off a cliff one night, in a reported attempt at suicide. That brought Lana around. She went to his hospital room and when he was well enough took him home. Then for a short period she seemed to have recaptured some of the bliss she had known in the first days of their marriage. But this, also, lasted just a few weeks—and Lana left again.

THAT was when Cheryl, Lana's daughter, came into the picture. On the verge of getting an annulment, on the grounds that Steve wasn't divorced from his former wife when she married him, Lana learned she was pregnant. She immediately called the whole thing off, had the baby, and then got a divorce. They say she really tried to be a good wife to Steve, but came to the conclusion that there was no hope. The break-up of this marriage had a very bad effect on her, she mourned a long time before she got back in the social swim.

When she began getting about again, Lana Turner, older and wiser than before, really tried to play the part of the gay bachelor girl with romance, but never marriage, on her mind. She went back to a former beau, lawyer Gregson Bautzer—and had quite a fling with him, if the gossip columns are accurate in their reports. Then she tried the field again. Her passion for Turhan Bey was the talk of the town for awhile. Then it was Rory Calhoun... Huntington Hartford... Robert Hutton and half a dozen other lesser known swains. Lana was on a merry-go-round.

Hollywood would have given you five to one just a few years ago that Lana Turner and Tyrone Power, a new divorcé himself, would marry; become the handsomest couple in Hollywood; and settle down and live happily ever after. They were inseparable. They had eyes only for each other when they appeared in public. In their spare time they were redecorating Ty's house for their home as soon as they took their vows. But one day Ty met a half-Mexican half-Dutch beauty named Linda Christian. He fell like a crippled Balloon and, so they say, didn't even tell Lana goodbye. At first she was heartsick, and afterwards furious. But there was nothing she could do about it. She'd been jilted. Lana Turner became Hollywood's symbol for a broken heart.

Bob Topping, Lana Turner's third husband, came into the picture at that time. Topping has a reputation for being a playboy. However his vast interests kept him busy away from the movie studios. This made him a different kind of a man as far as Lana Turner was concerned. She was terribly interested. Bob's courtship was along eastern lines. He had no glamor or handsome face. He just came calling like a business man dating a pretty girl. Lana liked it and dreamed of the future, imagining it would be just the same. They were married in an elaborate ceremony at the home of William Wilkerson, the publisher who had discovered her on the soda fountain stool years before. Lana knew that this time it was for keeps.

Many say that Lana was completely happy with Bob Topping for a long time. Others remind them that Bob stayed in the east for more than a year, keeping her away from pictures, and that when he did come back to Hollywood he didn't want his wife to work in the movies. They contend this made her miserable. No matter which is true, it became common Hollywood gossip shortly after Lana and Bob Topping moved into their huge Holmby Hills mansion that there was more than the usual amount of discord in the house. Bob, they said, hated Hollywood and found escape from it in the family bar. At any rate, he was never a genial chap around picture people.

FOR a long time Lana Turner heatedly denied reports that she was not happy, and that her marriage was on the verge of collapse. Topping, now that we think of it, never bothered to deny anything. When they went out in public Lana seemed like a different person. She sat quietly at their table seldom talking to anyone—and when she waved at a friend or exchanged a greeting it was always a chilly thing. The town couldn't understand it. But Lana understood herself. She was doing everything in her power to save this marriage.

This writer happened to be present at the blow-off party. It was a charity affair at Mocambo. Lana and Bob had a ringside table, because Lana was slated to appear in the show. During the evening nobody saw the Toppings exchange a civil word. For the most part Lana and Bob just sat silently looking at everything but each other. Her heart was in her face that night—and even an amateur observer could tell that she was through. As her friends left they didn't go up to speak to her. They didn't want to look in her eyes.

While this is being written, Lana Turner is still a married woman, although it is suspected that at any moment she will apply for her divorce and marry Fernando Lamas. Actually, the only thing that is holding up the wedding, according to the best informed sources, is the matter of a property settlement with Topping. It seems he is bargaining to trade the jewelry he gave his wife (heirlooms, they say) for the title to the home they lived in. In the meantime Lana has been sitting out the waiting period prior to a divorce application at Lake Tahoe. She has been there long enough. Now all it will take is a few minutes before a judge to get her freedom back.

During this waiting period, Lana has been trying to find Bob Topping, hoping to serve him with a summons that will bring him under the jurisdiction of the Nevada courts. She has told her pals that after 15 years in the movies she is practically broke—and that all she wants from her former husband is the money she paid to maintain their home—and the house itself. But if Topping does not make himself available to her lawyers, or sign a settlement that is approved by the Nevada courts, Lana will have to walk away from him with nothing, not even a roof that she can call her own. That is the reason for the delay.

Fernando Lamas is unlike any man that Lana Turner has ever been in love with before. He is violently Latin. He is more handsome than any of her men—and is, like most Latins, much more attentive than any of the others. However, since he lived in South America, where a woman is not quite on a par with a man in marriage, there is some speculation that he might revert to his native type once the knot is tied. These are the things that Lana Turner has to think about.

At 32, Lana is a changed woman. She is much more proper than she used to be and seems to have tired of the gay life. Although she has been the constant companion of Lamas for nearly a year, they have not been seen in public more than a dozen times. And never in the hot Sunset Strip spots. It is believed that this time Lana really intends to live a sedate life, with home and fire and slippers after a day's work. She hasn't lost all of her zest, though. People she works with say she is just as much fun as ever on the set, but not as zany.

LAMAS is a mature man, too. He is not much older than Lana but he has an adult approach to life's problems and is not a playboy or a free spender. Although he has been married, he has not been working at it for a few years—and until he met Lana he had not shown any interest in the Hollywood girls. So fidelity can be chalked up to his credit. He is anxious, they say, to marry just once more and will no doubt keep away from the temptations that make Hollywood marriages such hazardous enterprises.

Lana Turner has thought of all of these things. This time she is going to be sure. Browned and healthy from weeks in the open, she has a clear mind and a hopeful heart. She's had time to go over the mistakes she had made in the past; to look into the reasons why it hadn't worked with Artie Shaw, Steve Crane, Bob Topping—and why it hadn't come up marriage with Greg Bautzer, Vic Mature, Ty Power, Bob Hutton or the other men she had been in love with.

Yes, it was a day for thinking and meditation on life and love. The oar locks creaked and the oars slapped the top of the water as they bounced to the rhythm of the chop on the lake. The sun was bright and the wind fresh and the chill in the air exhilarating.

When Lana Turner reached for the oars and pointed her boat toward the shore and the cabin in the trees, she had it all figured out: No more tries at marriage. This time it would be for keeps. She'd let experience make her an expert at keeping a man happy—and at being happy herself. END

"You like people, Bill," Brenda said. "I'm not talking about the people I work with. I'm talking about our social life. Isn't it true that it's better to confine ourselves to the people we really love, to know them better, than to dissipate all this time on parties?"

So the parties—the big, lavish, meaningless parties—are out so far as the Holdens are concerned. And it's been a tough fight. Because in turning down invitations one is apt to hear, "Who does Bill Holden think he is?" Or, "Why, I remember him when he came back from the Army without a dime." Or, "I guess his success has gone to his head."

Well, who does Bill Holden think he is? Let's find out. Let's examine your "dream-boat" and discover what makes him tick.

Bill Holden is a most complicated young man. There were no show people in the Beedle family (William Beedle is his real name). There was not even a maiden aunt who longed to go on the stage. Bill's father was a chemist with a business of his own and he wanted Bill, the oldest son, to go into partnership with him. But Bill knew from the time he knew anything that he had to be an actor. "I felt by being an actor I could express myself better than in any other way. I like to see people amused and entertained and educated. I have a great yen for self-expression. Who knows why it was acting that seemed most right for me. Something in my childhood? Maybe. I don't know what it could have been. Why acting rather than writing or painting? All I know is that this is what I wanted. This, it seemed to me, was the only thing that could satisfy me."

He began to act at the Pasadena Community Theater when he was 19 and he never thought about the money such a career might bring nor the personal glory. He has never made a splash, hired a personal press agent, anything like that.

He had the burning drive for acting, the aspiration. So it was surprising that when he married Brenda Marshall, a very good actress, he could countenance her retirement. The only thing you could suppose was that Brenda—or Ardis, which is her real name, and that's what Bill calls her—did not have the big drive.

"But that's not true," Bill says. "Why, just think of her. A kid from Texas who wanted to be an actress so much that she went to New York, lived in those wretched brownstone flats on 21 dollars a week, when she could make 21 dollars a week, studied like a fiend with that great teacher Ouspenskaya. Oh yes, here was a girl with the burn for acting. I think what happened was that she simply found something that was more important to her—our home and the kids."

Being married to Bill Holden is not the easiest job there is. He is extremely high-tempered. Small things annoy him. Stupidities annoy him. If the soup comes on the table luke-warm, he's apt to blow up. (He doesn't like anything lukewarm.) But Brenda understands him and he understands her. He knows, for example, when she gets the itch for acting. Despite the fact that she strung along with his belief that, "if you aren't with your children during the formative years, you suffer an emotional loss," she becomes restless every now and again and wants to stand in front of that camera.

In 1947, when Bill was making a movie at Columbia, Brenda played opposite Alan Ladd in Whispering Smith. The picture was filmed at Paramount, Bill's home lot, and Brenda used his comfortable dressing room. It seemed like a very good arrangement. But when the picture was finished Brenda said, "Never again. I didn't realize how much I missed the kids."

But in 1949 she got the itch again and made a film with George Montgomery and once more she said, "Never again." During the past year she has done several radio shows with Bill.

THERE is no friction between these two because of Brenda's giving up her career. When they were in Europe recently it made them both laugh when people would crowd around calling, "Bren-da Mar-shall. Bren-da Mar-shall." They knew her much better than William Hol-den. To the European, Bill was an upstart newcomer in films and Brenda, whose pictures they were still seeing, was an established star.

Bill's biggest dream is 'to make a picture with Ardis.' "I think," he says, "we would work well together." Brenda would like this too. Although the marriage is a solid one, their working on the screen together would give them both a kind of security. And security is vitally important to Bill Holden.

His earliest memory is of the peaceful security of his home. The Beedle family lived in a small town in Illinois. At the back of the comfortable house there was a farmyard. This was not "the farm," which was out of town. This was merely a place where there were chickens and a couple of cows and a little white dog. Bill remembers being put out in this yard to take a sun bath, and watching the chickens and the cows and the dog. That's all. It merely shows that his first memory was a happy one.

But he knew insecurity a little while later and this was the most impressive moment of Bill's impressionable childhood. Bill's father went to California and was out there for a year. Although Bill's mother did not tell the boy why the father had gone, he was sensitive enough to know that something was wrong. All the other kids had fathers in the house. And now for a year there was just the mother, Bill and the baby. Bill now knows that his father was away for financial reasons.

Although he was only four years old at the time, he can still recall the emotion he felt there in the Los Angeles railroad station when he saw his father again and knew that the family was to be a family once more. The mother. The father. The boy. The baby. It was the happiest moment of his life when the father opened the door of the home he had made for them in California.

Since his earliest memory is of a pleasant barnyard and his most impressive memory has a happy rather than a frustrating ending you might assume that this is a completely calm, completely controlled young man, but one of his outstanding characteristics is his quick and violent temper which lashes out at human frailties. He has no time for a person who makes the same mistake twice. But there is one thing about Billy's temper. You always know exactly where you stand with him. He is not expert at concealing his emotions. If he thinks you're wrong, you'll know it right away. By the same token if you please him, he is quick to show his appreciation.

Most people have been disillusioned. Especially actors who run into their share of fair-weather friends, people who pretend to be charming and pull the dirty deal. But this is how Bill Holden feels. "I am too much of a cynic basically to be disillusioned. Not because of any lack of faith in people or situations. A cynic can never be disillusioned because he does not expect perfection. It can anger him when he does not find it, but it can't disillusion him. You see, I fall somewhere between the optimist and the pessimist. I have always tried to see both the good and the bad points of every situation. I think I am more down to earth than either the optimist or the pessimist because I look both ways."

If you ask his friends who Bill Holden thinks he is, you'll hear one thing again and again. "Bill is a hypochondriac. He's always imagining that he's sick." And, "Bill is the worry-wart of all time. Golly, that boy just makes up things to worry about."

So you ask Bill about this. Is he or isn't he? And this is the answer you'll get.

"Perhaps I am a worrier," he'll say, "but how do you define the word and the degree so that you can say, 'This person is a worrier' and 'That person does not worry'? We'd all be fools if we didn't worry some. I've always believed that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure, and when vitamins were first put on the market in commercial form I took them. They made me feel good. I don't think this makes me a notorious pill-swallower, and I don't know whose business it is if I want to take vitamins. I'm not a hypochondriac and I've never had anything the matter with me."

Ask him what he fears and you will hear, "I don't fear anything except God. My philosophy has changed many times. I only know as much as that which is behind me. I don't know what's ahead in experience. So my philosophy may change many times before I die. I hope it does. Otherwise, how do I progress? How do I revitalize myself?"

How does he revitalize himself? And how does he live with himself and his regrets? For he is human enough to have a profound and passionate regret.

He lost his brother in World War II. That was the baby who was a part of the family scene at the train. Bill feels that he failed him. The boy wanted a picture of Ardis and Bill and the kids, and Bill, who did not know he was going overseas so soon, neglected to send it to him. "Did I say I failed him?" Bill asked. "I didn't fail him. I failed myself."

THERE was the time they could have met in Texas. Both boys were in service. Both boys had leaves. Bill could have met his brother whom he had not seen for quite awhile. Instead Bill spent his leave doing a radio show to promote the sale of war bonds. "But," Bill says, "you cannot live your life with these regrets. It is selfish. If my brother had lived, it would not have occurred to me that I had failed him by not sending the pictures—that's just normal neglect. It would have seemed right that I sell the bonds rather than see my brother. But it is also a good thing to take stock of one's behavior, to ask while people are still living, 'What can I do to make people more comfortable?'"

For Bill Holden has a profound dedication to life. You have to know him very well to learn what he wants from life, because, as he says, it sounds so corny. But if you really want to know who Bill Holden thinks he is you have to know his secret wish. It is simply this: He wants everything to be better. "And if that's corny, make the most of it," he says. "Personally I think wanting everything—and it's everything, mind you—to be better is the divine wish."

Bill went on. "I like to see people enjoy themselves—and I don't necessarily mean in night clubs and other so-called places of amusement. I like to see people participating in a project—making a movie, for example, the crew working together as a unit, the cast and the director seeing eye to eye, enjoying the work. Or people together in a community project or together in family life. That's how I think people really enjoy themselves."

Beside this, Bill has two ways of enjoying himself. He has recently put in a swimming pool at his and Brenda's home and it thrills him to "see the kids develop, watch the little bodies grow stronger day by day. They are all going to turn out to be real good swimmers." And then there is the pleasure he knows during "time spent in good conversation with good friends."

of service. Then he found himself, as he says, "artistically and financially bankrupt." He was an actor without a job. He was a husband and the father of three children without money. In any man's language this is a situation, but Bill knew what he must do.

He had to grow up and grow up fast. Was he to get a job, any job to make some money to support his family? What could he do? Except for one summer when he was going to school and had worked at his father's chemical plant he had never done anything but act. How was he equipped to earn a living? Yet he was "artistically and financially bankrupt." He put art first. He knew he had to put his artistic house in order or he would be unable to survive.

He saw that there was a kind of renaissance in the art world. Everything was more factual. Films were nodding to the documentary. Television was able to report an event while it occurred. Bill knew he must ride with the change in his world. What he had known about acting before he went into Service was now old-fashioned. So he studied to change his entire approach to his job. And by bettering himself artistically "the financial thing," as he says, "took care of itself."

He did not fly off in all directions. He knew he was an actor. To make himself a better actor would, he felt, assure financial success. At least he knew that he had to give it a go thoughtfully and soberly. But he says, "Nobody does a job with bootstraps alone. You need help along the way. I got that help. Willy Wilder, that fine director, asked for me in his pictures and contributed immeasurably to what success I have. Others helped too. For no man is an island and without the sincere help of others there can be no real success." Bill loves people. He likes to work with people as part of a unit. He is not a rugged individualist.

But the funny thing about Bill is that for all his lofty feeling for art the thing that makes him really laugh is slapstick comedy. He roars at The Three Stooges and the beatings they take. And Martin and Lewis. Wow! Once, shortly after he got out of the Army when his spirits were at their lowest ebb, he went into a variety show in downtown Los Angeles. A couple of knockabout comics were on the stage. Bill laughed so much that an usher tapped him on the shoulder and asked him to pipe down. Others in the audience couldn't hear what was being said on the stage. He came out of the theatre happy and refreshed.

ALTHOUGH Bill knows and understands classical music, he is crazy about New Orleans jazz. He has a huge record collection of this type of music, and when he was in New Orleans not too long ago he bought himself some bones. Brenda says one of the funniest sights of all time was Bill learning to rattle those bones. He would get off in a corner of the house and, his brow furrowed, concentrate on the bones as if he were studying nothing less than the Einstein theory.

He rattles the bones very well indeed because he has perfect rhythm. Just watch him move and you realize his sense of rhythm.

But Bill does not impose his talent for bone playing on his friends. He is no exhibitionist. When he comes into a room full of people he has no desire to be "a character." If, however, he likes the people in the room and the feeling is warm and friendly and he remembers a story he thinks will amuse, he can be the funniest guy in the world. He tells a story very well and can set his friends off into howls of laughter when he feels like it.

But laughter is not the end and aim of this young man's life. He changed much of his thinking while he and Brenda were in Europe. "You need a month in Europe to adjust to the new way of life," he says, "and then you need a couple more months actually to live and to realize that what we think are such important problems in Hollywood lose their importance. That's good."

Early in the European stay Willy Wilder was there too. He telephoned the Holdens to say he had planned a day. Bill said he was beat and could not get up early enough. Wilder jumped on him with all four feet. What he said about getting the lead out is unprintable. So Bill and Brenda went on the tour and now Bill says, "It was one of the best days of my life," and he has learned that you cannot miss a day of life because life is something to explore, to search out, to experience and to know thoroughly.

There are no actorish trappings about Bill. It took him forever to make up his mind to buy a Cadillac. He knew the car had a good motor but it seemed so ostentatious. It's not that he cares what people think of him, but he cares what he thinks of himself. For there is absolutely and positively nothing phony about him.

The way he has managed to become a real father to his stepdaughter, Virginia, brings a lump to the throat. Since he feels no difference between her and his own children, she is given the security of a father and it has been his and Brenda's chore to guide the child through the perilous days of adolescence. He is a good father. Not a mushy father but a good friendly parent.

Not so long ago Virginia wanted to do something that Bill felt she would regret later. He explained to her why the laws for minors were made, i. e. because only mature judgment should be brought to bear on a mature step. So he asked Virginia to sit down and write out everything she had believed a year ago and then to list everything she believed today. She was amazed to discover how her point of view had changed and Bill was then able to point out that if she had changed so much in the past year it was inevitable that she change as drastically in the coming one.

BILL HOLDEN is an exciting, interesting, intellectual young man. He is complicated but not confused. Brenda summed him up when she said, "He is like a guy walking three straight lines. When he's in the right lane he will veer to the right. When he's in the left lane he'll lean that way. But when he's walking down the middle where he's supposed to walk—well, that's when he really walks straight." END

Gene's wife also had one special request. Having had 20 years of experience living with Gene's constantly growing wardrobe of boots, hats, show clothes, and everyday Western suits, she said to the architect, "I know this sounds foolish, but I really think we need one whole room for Gene's clothes."

That's what she got. In the Autry residence there is one room, the size of a large bedroom, 17 feet square, which contains nothing but closets full of Autry clothes. One wall closet is filled with some 96 elaborately embroidered rodeo shirts; another contains three dozen hats and 24 pairs of boots. The fourth wall has a lavatory and a three-way mirror, while in the center of the room stands an island of additional storage space. It houses, among other conveniences, a steam cabinet, a tie rack large enough to hold 200 ties, and a five-foot stack of drawers.

The flooring in this room consists of cork squares. The wardrobe doors are natural wood and the linen draperies are beige and brown. A tailor who once visited the wardrobe estimated that Autry's clothes are worth somewhere around $35,000. "With today's prices," he says, "the replacement figure might hit as high as $50,000."

Since the Autrys have no children, they decided upon a moderately-sized residence. "Our architect told us," Mrs. Autry recalls, "that if we built a large place it would lose the warmth and homey atmosphere we were looking for."

"Funny thing about building a house," 80 Gene himself says, "but as the construction progressed the house seemed to get larger. I remember when the concrete was first poured. The rooms here seemed awful small. Then when the frame went up, the rooms seemed bigger, but not too much. After the plaster was added, however, they took on a good size."

IN SELECTING color schemes for the house, Mrs. Autry had the help of an experienced decorator named Everett Sebring. She explained to Sebring that she wasn't at all timid or conservative about colors. "I want plenty of yellows and reds and greens," she said, "but I want them to blend." Sebring listened sympathetically, then made the sound suggestion that she choose her color tones from the surrounding foliage. She agreed. The yellow in the kitchen and dining room is the faded, mustard yellow of Acacia blossoms. The greens are grey-greens identical with the color of the dusty leaves on the liveoaks; and the reds are strong and as bright as a geranium.

Once a color was established in a room, that same shade was repeated in other places throughout the house. In that way the eye doesn't jump from one color spot to another, and there is a flowing color continuity.

Ina Autry also explained to her decorator that she wanted her house furnished in comfortable Western, but not in the strictly ranch-house style the movies term Western. "We want to use our Frederic Remington paintings and bronzes," she pointed out, "but let's not have any Navajo rugs or mission furniture. They belong out on the ranch."

Sebring agreed completely. Since his clients had money, he commissioned the best furniture-makers in California to design some simple but distinguished furniture for them.

The Autry bed, their dining room set, their heavy oak pieces in the library and bar—all these are custombuilt and cost a pretty penny. Gene is extremely fond of the library because it holds many of his sentimental trophies, the most favored of which is an antique bronze of horses. It was given to him by an elderly Boston lady, because, as she explained to him, "You've given my children so many years of clean and wholesome entertainment."

Gene's youthful fans expect him to stay out of the kitchen which is a woman's workplace, and while he does, even in his own home, this is especially difficult since the Autry house boasts one of the best-equipped kitchens in California. There's a service porch with a Spanish tile sink especially constructed for setting up flower arrangements. There's a pantry complete with an extra refrigerator, shelves well stocked with party-size copper chafing dishes, coffee urns which hold two gallons and more, and loads of barbecue equipment. The kitchen proper contains two stoves, one gas and one electric, yards of counter-work space, and an island of free-standing sink which allows two cooks to work simultaneously in one kitchen or one cook to do two simultaneous jobs.

When Gene is at home which isn't often he likes best to have 20 or 30 friends in for a barbecue supper. At these parties he serves the Autry special, a boned-out New York cut of beef which weighs between eight and ten pounds. Along with the meat go corn pudding, potatoes au gratin, green beans and cheese, a salad mold, hot gingerbread and ice cream. And everyone is expected to have seconds.

At one such party recently, an old friend of Gene's who remembered him as "a barefoot, cotton-chopping farm boy" and later as a freight handler on the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad in Oklahoma, said to Mrs. Autry. "I remember your husband when he couldn't get a job as a cowhand. How come after all these years, he winds up with a beautiful home like this and all the money he needs?"

Ina Mae looked across the lawn to her husband. She saw an actor-singer-composer-rodeo-star-and-business tycoon, whose yearly calendar calls for six full-length motion pictures, 26 TV films, a weekly radio show, composing 15 songs, recording another two dozen for Columbia Records, three nation-wide personal appearance tours and periodic visits to supervise his holdings. She counted up his purely tangible assets which include a chain of Texas movie theatres, a flying school, three western radio stations, five ranches, and two cowboy music publishing houses. She remembered him as she'd met the shy young man in 1932. She mulled the old cow-hand's question over for a few seconds.

ILL TELL you, Jimmy," she finally said, "Gene owes his success to his catnaps. You'll notice when he appears to be listening to a record he's really sleeping for two or three minutes. He even dozes off when the conversation lags or between takes on the set. Every time he sleeps for two or three minutes, he dreams of some money-making idea. That's how come we own this house."

The old-timer looked at Mrs. Autry with a quizzical eye. "Don't rightly know, Ina Mae," he said, "whether I believe you. I been sleepin' fer well nigh onto 60 years, and I ain't earned a plug nickel yet." END

(Continued from page 12) photographer about it, but explained to your correspondent that the reason she won't let her three-year-old Benjy pose for photos is because she doesn't want him to grow up just being "Olivia DeHavilland's son" . . . Katie Hepburn didn't endear herself to the cast of her London play, The Millionairess, by ordering them not to talk to her offstage.

ODDS BODKINS:

Corinne Calvet and John Bromfield threw a party for their agent, Henry Willson, who was sailing a few days later on the Ile de France to visit another of his clients, Rock Hudson, in Europe. The climax of the party came when John stripped down to his swimming trunks in front of his guests (including Alexis Smith and Craig Stevens, Marie Wilson and Bob Fal-lon, Susan Zanuck and Ar-thur Loew, Jr., Cy Howard and Katy Jurado, and Donald O'Connor) and jumped into the pool, whereupon Corinne placed a cake that was a replica of the Ile de France on John's hands. He swam from one end of the pool to the other underwater, bringing the "ship" safely to port at Henry's feet . . . Jan Sterling and Willard Parker got along beautifully while making Rock Grayson's Woman at Paramount, in spite of the fact that Willard's married to Virginia Field, who once was married to Jan's Paul Douglas!

Everyone's been complaining about how FAT Shelley looked in My Man And I. Only consolation is that she plays an alcoholic in the picture, which might be her excuse . . . Aggie Moorehead tinted her hair to match exactly the carrot color of fiancé Bob Geist's crowning glory. Sounds like a new His-&-Her fad! . . . While co-starring with Marilyn Mon-roe in Gentlemen Prefer Blondes, Jane Russell expects to enlist Miss M. in her Sunday School classes . . . Tony Curtis learned how to saw his Janet in half for their roles in Houdini. He also learned how to wriggle out of a strait-jacket in 22 seconds flat for his part as a magician . . . A bootleg long-play recording of Judy Garland's 45 minutes onstage at New York's Palace Theater is floating around Holly-wood . . . There must be a joke in this some-where: Betty Hutton will take a vacation in Ireland after she plays a vaudeville date at the London Palladium. Two of the towns she will visit on the Emerald Isle are called Dippey and Looney!

FUNNIES:

Cathy Crosby, Bob's daughter, asked her daddy to take her to see Rock Hudson. Said Bob, "What part of the country do we visit to dig up THAT species?" . . . Pinky Lee calls Weepin' Johnnie Ray's fans "sobby boxers" . . . Simile: As un-organized as a handful of clothes hangers . . . Jane Wyman received a letter from a fan in Sing Sing prison: "I loved your per-formance in The Blue Veil. It's the best thing I've seen in three years, three months and eight days" . . . When an actor "blows up" on one of his lines in a television movie the director seldom orders a re-take but for rea-sons of economy moves in the camera and picks up the line from a new angle. So when Guy Madison fluffs his dialog on the Wild Bill Hickok set, Andy Devine shouts, "There goes Guy, stuttering himself into a closeup again!"

LONG HUNCH DEP'T:

It will be many a moon before Alan Ladd forgives the cruel, beastly person who poisoned Alan's favorite dog, Jezebel. Here's what hap-pened: Just before he left for Europe Alan's home was being haunted by a crackpot fan who wanted one last look at the star be-fore he sailed. Jezebel chased the fan off the grounds. A few days later, after Alan had left, the fan came back and dropped some poisoned meat on the grounds. And Alan's prize boxer ate it and died . . . Incidentally, keep your eye on Carol Lee Ladd and young Bill Evans, son of the Rev. Louis Evans, whose brother is married to Colleen Townsend. This is the most hush-husb romance of the year, but one of the most serious. Bill rushed all the way back from his African missionary chores to meet Carol Lee before she sailed with Alan and Sue.

MGM's prize bait to lure Deanna Durbin back to Hollywood: the starring role in Kiss Me, Kate . . . There would never be any dis-sension in the Donald O'Connor household, believe me, if somebody would recognize the acting talents of Gwen, his wife, and make her a star too. This is a familiar plaint, isn't it? I think it's called Careeritis . . . Warners went all-out to get the Topsy And Eva script after Betty Hutton bowed out of her Para-mount contract rather than co-star in it with Ginger Rogers. Warners decided they would like the same property, which is the biography of the fabulous blonde Duncan Sisters, for Doris Day and Virginia Mayo.

HOLLYWOOD HEARTBEATS:

Esther Williams donated a complete king-size swimming pool, specially equipped for training blind children to swim, to the Los Angeles School for Visually Handicapped Chil-dren . . . Dick Contino, with 16 weeks of basic training under his belt, spent 21 days on furlough in Glendale and Hollywood before shipping out . . . Cary Grant arrived for his first day's work with Deborah Kerr in Dream Wife at MGM nervous and shaking. The usually suave, sophisticated Cary seemed out of character. I asked him what was wrong. He explained he has ALWAYS been that way at the start of every picture! In fact, for this one he couldn't eat bis dinner the night before and couldn't sleep a wink all night!

Guess what Joan Crawford, Ruth Hussey and Claire Trevor talked about while dunking their lily-white shapes into the Alisal Ranch swimming pool? Pediatricians, allergies and diets, in that order. Sounds more like the Champaign-Urbana Faculty Wives' Club than Hollywood, doesn't it? . . . Roy Rogers put up the financing for a religious film being pro-duced by the Reverend Mal Boyd.

Still other columnists insisted that Mario had left his wife and children and was living with his parents, Antonio and Maria Cocozza, in the $27,500 house he had bought for them in the Pacific Palisades.

At the time this particular rumor was gaining currency, Mario and Betty Lanza were trying to work out a deal with Nancy Sinatra for the purchase of her large home. The Lanzas detest the French chateau-type house they currently occupy in Beverly Hills—and were anxious to buy the estate which Frank Sinatra in the more halcyon days, had purchased for his Nancy.

Nancy sees no sense in maintaining a large overhead—after all, it is only reasonable to assume that Sinatra's alimony payments will soon approach the minimum—so Nancy has been trying to sell the large house and move to smaller quarters.

She asked Betty and Mario $175,000 for her home with the furnishings. Certainly, Sinatra paid a whole lot more for the set-up, approximately $250,000—and while Mario was willing to close the deal at that price, Betty refused.

"If I'm going to pay $175,000 for a house," she said, "I'd just as soon have one built, and get everything the way I want it."

"But it takes so long to build," Mario insisted. "Why don't we buy this and get it over with?"

"I'm sorry," Betty said—she's a very practical girl, Mario's Betty—"I think it's too much money—not only the original cost but how about the upkeep? We'll be supporting gardeners for life."

Mario, who usually has his way about most things, finally agreed that under the circumstances, he and Betty would be better off renting a place.

THE following day Betty and Lloyd Shearer, a writer friend of the Lanzas, were spotted riding around Beverly Hills, Bel-Air and Brentwood, inspecting various houses for rent.

While this was going on, Mario, who hates house-hunting, was relaxing out at Chatsworth in the San Fernando Valley, at John Carroll's ranch. Lanza is an inveterate horse-lover and can spend hours each day riding, feeding, and just fooling around with horses.

Mario spoke with Carroll about his suspension by the studio, filling him in on certain details. Carroll advised Mario to return to the MGM fold. Betty then phoned Mario to tell him that Shearer, too, felt strongly that Mario should settle his differences with the studio immediately. Before it was too late.

Mario said he was coming home in a few hours and had definitely made up his mind. He was going to make The Student Prince.

The following afternoon he drove to MGM, called on Eddie Mannix, the general manager, and Dore Schary, vice-president in charge of production—and overnight there was a complete change in the publicity.

Lanza was no longer nuts. Lanza was no longer flying to New York to see Nick Schenck, president of Loew's. Lanza was no longer leaving his wife. In fact discussions were under way and it looked very much as if Mario and The Student Prince would roll by the end of September. That night the 24-hour detective-watch at Lanza's home was removed.

Who hired detectives to trail Lanza during his studio dispute, no one is saying—but there undoubtedly was a careful watching of his every move.

Anyway, Mario promised the studio executives that he would return in a week for the final solution of all problems.

What were these problems? In contrast to Because You're Mine, his previous film, the story-line and dialogue of which he had vociferously decried, claiming they were juvenile—Mario had praised practically everything about the advance preparation of The Student Prince. He had recorded the musical selections which he himself termed, "Some of the best I've ever done." Of the script, he said, "I love it. I think it's great." Of Ann Blyth, his leading lady borrowed from Universal at a loanout figure of $50,000, he had said, "That Ann is a great trouper. I'm lucky to have her."

What then was wrong?

LANZA will not come right out and say it, and neither will the studio—but it is no secret that Mario and Curtis Bernhardt, the man scheduled to direct The Student Prince, saw eye to eye on practically nothing with regard to the film.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

After seeing the world premiere of Two Guys From Texas, I attempted to get the two guys' autographs. I easily got Jack Carson's, but just as Dennis Morgan took my fountain pen and began to write, his car started up. "Maybe next time, Texas," he said. To this day I wonder if Dennis Morgan still has my fountain pen.

Sandy Kahn
Denton, Texas

Bernhardt allegedly had certain definite ideas of how and where Mario's singing should fit into the script.

Mario reportedly felt that Bernhardt should be directing some other picture perhaps a drama, that a musical was a little beyond his ken, even though Bernhardt was a European of considerable knowledge and musical background, and had directed that famous musical comedy The Merry Widow.

There are some who say that the studio was prepared to transfer Bernhardt to some other production—after all, star have had directors removed willy-nilly from their pictures for years—in fact many stars refuse to sign for a film unless they have approval of the director in advance—but apparently even the suggested removal of Bernhardt from the production didn't seem to satisfy Mario.

It was then suggested in other quarters that for some strange reason Mario was afraid to go ahead with The Student Prince. Bernhardt was just an excuse.

The story spread that the only anodyne for Mario's attack of stagefright or camerafright or pre-production nervousness was money. He wanted a big fat bonus from the studio, various sources intimating out that the tenor from Philadelphia was really broke, having lost half a million in oil and mining speculation.

This happens to be pure baloney. Lanza is not broke. As Sam Weiler, the business manager who broke with him several months ago said on his return to Beverly Hills recently, "Mario has a nice six-figure bank balance. In addition, his recording royalties continue to flow in."

Mario had told the studio executives that he would be back in one week's time to settle all the details and to guarantee unconditionally his good conduct in the future. He was scheduled to show up on a Tuesday.

Came Tuesday and no Lanza. Was he sick? Not so sick that he couldn't go out and plunk down $6,000 for a high speed racing car, a violet-colored custom-made Muntz Jet that hits 160 miles per hour on the open road.

Came Wednesday and no Lanza. Was he indisposed? Not so indisposed that he couldn't trade the old family Cadillac for a 1952 model, costing $5,200.

The studio phoned, wired, sent messages. Mario still refused to come in and discuss the final details of his reformation.

A high echelon meeting was called, and the entire case was reviewed before the studio decided to file suit against Mario.

It was recalled that after Mario had finished recording the songs for The Student Prince—this was in August—he was both tired and upset—tired of working long and arduous hours, and upset because his friendship with Sam Weiler, his patron and business manager, had come to an end.

In fact, Mama and Papa Cocozza, who have been accused of spoiling Mario in his youth, called upon Dore Schary.

"Mr. Schary," said Papa Cocozza, "you have been very kind to Mario, and we're grateful, but the boy is very tired. He needs a few days' rest before the picture starts. Is this possible for you to arrange?"

Schary, who is basically a kind and generous man, flashed one of his toothy grins at Mama and Papa Cocozza, "Of course, it's possible," he said. "How much time does he need?"

"One week would be perfect," said Papa Cocozza.

Schary got up. "I'll tell you what," he said to Mario's parents. "You tell Mario I want him to take two weeks. How's that?"

Mama and Papa were overjoyed. They thanked Schary profusely. What an understanding man. What a wonderful executive! They raced to Mario's house and told him the good news. Mr. Schary was giving him two weeks off—he should rest, take it easy, start the picture relaxed and refreshed. Mario was beaming and happy. When he's happy he eats.

The two weeks passed. Mario was notified that The Student Prince would roll on August 23rd. Mario refused to appear. The studio threatened to ban him from his radio show since they controlled his radio rights. Mario showed up at the wardrobe department on a Thursday. His broadcast went on the air Friday. It was his last broadcast. The studio put its corporate foot down. Mario became $5,200 poorer each Friday. That's how much his radio program brought in.

Two weeks passed—two weeks in which the studio announced the possible cancellation of the film; the gossipmongers insisted Lanza was off his rocker, fighting with his wife, living in New York, living with his parents, eloping with a new girl, and all sorts of ridiculous and incredible stories. These bad guesses faded into nothingness when Mario and the studio agreed to kiss and make up by way of talking about the possibility of getting a new director and amending

Ann Pinkham says—

"Now...no monthly cramps NOT EVEN ON VERY FIRST DAY!"

"NO LONGER," adds Ann Pinkham, "is it necessary for girls and women to suffer 'bad days' from functionally-caused menstrual distress.

"So if you experience cramps, pain and headaches, feel as though you'd been literally dragged through a knothole at such times—you'll be glad to know about this way to relieve such discomfort...even on the first, worst day of your period!"

Here's the news. In doctors' tests, 3 out of 4 women stopped or strikingly relieved such suffering...by taking Lydia E. Pinkham's new Tablets or Compound.

That's because Lydia Pinkham's is scientifically modern in action—has a quieting, soothing effect on uterine contractions that may cause the pain. Thus it helps to ease the tension, actually prevent distress.

certain clauses in Mario's basic employment contract. If he suffered more than the six months it calls for in 1952, the overtime would be deducted in 1953.

But once again the incredible Mario refused to show up at the studio to discuss these problems. Nor would he send word. He just didn't feel like it, didn't feel up to it.

Friends who talked to his parents were told that Mario had suffered from these "bad-boy spells" before, but never had they lasted this long. Mama and Papa Cocozza were genuinely worried. They spoke to their beloved boy. Mario was adamant. He wasn't going into the studio until he felt the time was ripe, and the time wasn't now.

In the meanwhile by the process of osmosis the studio came around to the realization that Mario was being completely unreasonable. It ordered the law firm of Loeb & Loeb to draw up the necessary legal papers. The accounting department would tell the lawyers exactly how much Metro had spent in preparing The Student Prince.

WHILE the legal beagles were getting ready to throw the book at Mario, an announcement wafted over from London that Mario's last film, Because You're Mine, had been chosen for the royal command performance. When Mario heard this, he beamed. "It's the most marvelous thing that ever happened to me," he said, whereupon he called up the girls in his office on South Beverly Boulevard and issued a stand-by order. Stand by to close the office. Mario was thinking of taking his whole family, his whole office staff to London for the command performance.

Less than 24 hours later, the owners of MGM, Loew's Inc., filed a $5,195,888 breach of contract against Alfred Arnold Cocozza (Mario's real name) charging him with refusal to sing in The Student Prince, and demanding that the court issue an injunction preventing Mario from performing services for any other person or company pending settlement of his contractual difficulties with the studio.

The complaint specifically asked $695,888 in special damages, claiming that amount as the cost for the film's preparation and $4,500,000 in general damages for the loss of prospective profits.

At the time Lanza heard the news of this legal suit, he was sipping a fruit punch in the Bel-Air Hotel suite of Freddie Matsuo, one of his Hawaiian friends, who a few years previously had booked the Lanza concerts when Mario sang in Honolulu.

MARIO laughed when he heard the news. After all it's flattering to be sued for more than $5,000,000. In his mind, however, he debated several possible courses of action to take.

He could move his whole family to England. That would be a little tough, however, because Betty is expecting a third child in December and wants to have it in the U.S.

He could give up making motion pictures which, after all, brings him a good deal less revenue than his concerts and recordings.

He could move his family to Honolulu, cut down on his expenses, live on his recording royalties.

He could make peace with the studio and start The Student Prince all over again.

He could fight the studio in a long drawn-out legal battle; maybe win; maybe lose. In any event it was doubtful if any court in the land would issue an injunction in an effort to deprive him from making a living.

Or he could go to see a doctor and find out what was really bothering him.

As we go to press, Mario has not as yet made up his mind. END

(Continued from page 55) they will do when they get to Hollywood, Doris and her husband, George Weidler, parked a trailer in a vacant lot in the San Fernando Valley. When they put out feelers for work, they had to trust to the kindness of a nearby store for a telephone communication in case an offer of a job came through.

Doris, of course, had that famous smile even then. The broad grin with the white teeth was a trademark, and she was able to flash it on no matter what the situation. But if you had known her then, you'd have seen that in repose the smile seldom appeared. And as the weeks went by and no sign of even a night club date appeared, let alone the movies, the smile appeared less and less often.

A FEW months after she had been in California, a crisis suddenly confronted Doris. Her marriage to George, which was her second try at wedlock, was no go. Nothing went right. George was not staying with her as much as he should have. They were too poor, even for the skimpy budget they had set for themselves. So one night Doris walked away from the trailer, and took a small room in a low-priced Hollywood hotel.

The chance she had been waiting for came shortly after that. A call came from her agent, a fellow by the name of Al Levy who obviously had a faith in her talent that he shared with no one else. He called her at the hotel when she was at her lowest ebb, almost at the bottom.

"Meet me at nine o'clock tomorrow morning," he said. "We're going out to Warner Brothers."

Doris was facing a mirror as she took the call. She saw reflected a tall, rather plain girl with corn silk hair, a nose too small, and worst of all a face covered with freckles. She didn't think it was a glamorous picture.

"Warner Brothers!" She said. "What for?"

"We're going to make a test, Dope," said Levy.

"A test!" said Doris. "You sure you've got the right girl?"

"Just be ready," said Levy, and hung up.

The next morning Al Levy swung Doris Day through the front gate of the Warner Brothers Studio and she felt like a fool. She was making a big mistake she thought, walking into an obvious insult. Who would hire a girl like her for the movies?

The test was made by Michael Curtiz, the director who at that time was the toast of the town for his recent picture, Casablanca. He put Doris through her paces. In spite of his consideration and tact she was sure he hated her and was just too polite to offend her. She admitted later that she thought for a time that there was no film in the camera. Why waste film on somebody who was quite visibly not the type.

Doris left the studio with a sigh of relief and vowed she'd never set foot in another. She tried to get the whole thing out of her mind and went back to the daily grind of trying to line up a deal with a band, or get solo singing engagements. She was truly astonished a few days later when Levy telephoned her again and said they were wanted at the studio.

"Horrors," she thought, "they probably want to make me pay for the money they spent on the test." Levy took her straight to Curtiz' office. The director sat behind his desk and looked at her a long time without speaking.

"Have you ever had any dramatic experience?" he asked finally.

"No, sir," said Doris.

"Hmmm," said Curtiz. "Very good. Have you ever taken lessons in acting?"

"No, sir," said Doris.

"Good. Good," said Curtiz.

Then he turned to the agent. "People," he said, "are going to say that I am crazy, but I will sign this girl to a personal contract and give her the leading role opposite Jack Carson in the picture I am preparing."

Doris sat ashen-faced and listened. She was sure she was not hearing right. Then she got up from the chair and walked from the studio in a daze. When she got home, she sat alone in her room for hours, not even answering the phone, trying to figure out what strange trick life was getting ready to play on her now.

Now, this is not a story about how Doris Day became a star in pictures. That has been told many times. But it is proper to repeat that while she was a smash hit from the beginning, and that after awhile Warner Brothers bought her contract from Curtiz for a pretty penny. She's been their top star ever since. But all of the time the smile was a prop, the cheery attitude a fake. Doris Day was not really happy down deep in her heart.

If you'll remember back to those days, you'll recall that Doris was pretty much a play girl. She spent most of her time with Jack Carson, a fellow who likes nothing better than an evening on the town, in the night clubs and with gay companions. When they weren't working, they rested up during the day and made the rounds at night. Neither of them could have been called excessive drinkers or dissipaters in any form, but they lived a gay existence. Although the whole town thought they were in love and would some day marry, they themselves never thought they were even mildly in love.

By the time Doris Day was ready for happiness she had had everything else she wanted. She was a big star, used to the adulation and the big money. She radiated confidence that it would go on forever. But inwardly she was filled with doubts. She was like a person attending a costume party in a get-up that she really didn't belong in. Accepted, but knowing that the whole thing was a gag. When she was alone at night, before she went to sleep, Doris used to lie awake and count her blessings and evaluate her shortcomings. It was in those hours that she grew frightened and dreaded the

One difficulty facing fiction writers is naming their characters. They can never be certain that someone will not claim that his name has been used for an unpleasant character and threaten a lawsuit. One Hollywood studio solved the problem. Its carpenter, Frank W. Josephson, has, for the last 14 years, rented his name to the company so that some other Frank Josephson cannot bring an action. His name appears in screen divorce suits, tagged to dead bodies and unsavory characters.

The salvation of the old Doris Day, and the birth of the new, came about in a strange way. She hadn't seen her husband for quite a while. They were divorced, held no grudges, but neither did they share confidences. One day he called and said he had a couple of things they ought to talk over. Doris agreed to meet him.

Doris has said since then that seeing the transformation in George Weidler was one of the big shocks of her life. George, the fellow who lived for the kicks of today, the lad with the often sad and worried look, the boy with no taste for responsibilities of any kind stood before her and looked like a stranger. He stood erect and sure of himself. His face was serene and purpose was in his eyes. When he spoke he said something. Just what he meant. And his kindness in dealing with the mutual problem they faced was as surprising as his changed appearance.

Their business concluded, George was about to go, but Doris wouldn't let him.

"Something's happened to you," she said. "I don't know what it is, George, but something's happened to you that I wish could happen to me. You're strong, and I always thought I was the strong one."

George smiled and sat down again. "Would you like me to tell you about it?" he asked.

"Please tell me," Doris begged.

They sat and talked for a long time. George had discovered a religious science—that maybe wasn't altogether a religion or a science—but a way of life. He had found it when he needed it most, and it had made him happy for the first time that he could remember. Doris wanted to know how she could get to know about it and he told her, told her how to approach it, where to read about it and what it would do for her. She walked away from that meeting determined to get off the Hollywood merry-go-round and look for some of the peace she had thought she'd find if she ever got financial security.

A number of things that happened to Doris after that seemed to impel her toward a state of peace. Small things at first, but all part of a pattern that was to change her life completely.

THEN she received a blow where it hurt most. She developed a bad throat, and she earned a living with her throat. She went to a doctor and had an examination. There was nothing very dangerous about her condition, he told her, but she would have to remain silent for a long time and later on an operation might be required.

In the cold light of day, when Doris left the doctor's office, she took stock of herself once more and decided that rather than agree to the diagnosis and curtail her work—which was the only thing she really loved about her life—she would fight it out within herself. She trembled a little as she got into her car and lit a cigarette with nervous fingers. Suddenly she looked at the cigarette. And then she threw it as far away as she could. She has never smoked a cigarette since. She whipped the trouble with her throat, and it has never returned.

The same thing happened with liquor. While she was never a heavy drinker, Doris Day was like most people in Hollywood, a slave to the cocktail habit. Cocktails before lunch, maybe, and a cocktail before dinner. If she had to meet someone late in the afternoon, it was, naturally, for cocktails. As she began to find peace easier through her study of the new way of life she had discovered, Doris came to the conclusion that the cocktail was an enemy of the calm she wanted. She decided at a cocktail party one afternoon, after looking at what was happening to the rest of the people there, to put down her glass and she has never, to this day, lifted another.

The third thing that happened to Doris Day during her search for peace was a man. She had long before stopped making the gay rounds with Jack Carson. And, to tell the truth, she was lonely. Although she had always dealt exclusively with Al Levy in her agent's office, she had met another young fellow who was a partner there by the name of Marty Melcher. Melcher was a tall, rather esthetic type of fellow, quiet and not too friendly. One day Levy was out of town and he asked Melcher to escort Doris to a radio program she was booked for.

After the show Doris and Marty went to a restaurant for a bite to eat. They sat and talked for quite a while, and Doris was quite taken with the quiet manner of the man. And Marty was a bit more cordial than usual. They both wanted to meet a second time, so they did the day after. That was really when they had their first serious conversation. Doris told Marty about the new thing she was finding in her life. And he told her that he had been in a very unhappy state because of a separation from his wife and was seeking the same refuge.

It might have been decided that night that Doris Day and Marty Melcher would be together forever, but, of course, neither of them knew it. They did know, though, that they thought alike and were kindred

At a cocktail party, Hymie Fink took a photograph of a well known starlet. Then he said to her: "I'll send you a copy of the picture. Would you like it mounted?" "Oh, that would be wonderful," replied the starlet, "I look so much better on a horse."

Sidney Skolsky in

souls in a strange environment. They met again and again. Soon the gossipers were saying they were in love. If they were, they didn't know it, but they did know that they had a common purpose, to achieve the serenity they knew possible in their spiritual life.

A LOT of water has passed under the bridge since that day. Now Doris and Marty are married, after one of the most casual courtships known in Hollywood. There was never any of the mad chasing that is so common in Filmtown when a man is after a girl. They just sort of drifted toward one another. They found not only comfort but solace in one another's company—and peace in their mutual search for something and someone to believe in.

Now, there is nothing in life that can hurt Doris Day. She is one of the best-adjusted actresses in Hollywood, and there is no better wife and mother. Her home is a haven for the friends they want. They are the staunch confidants of practically all of the kids in the neighborhood.

Those visitors to the set of that Warner Brothers musical thought they were seeing a great example of control when they saw Doris Day go through a work-a-day experience that had everyone else in the company tearing at their hair. But they really were not. They were just watching a girl work who has found peace, a true, deep, abiding peace.

Doris Day will go a longer way than she ever might have before. You see she knows herself completely, and she knows exactly where she's going. END

hedda hopper spikes those betty grable rumors

Six years ago, I remember, she bowed out of No Wedding Ring without arousing the ire of the studio. However, refusing to do a picture was so unusual for Betty that I visited her in her Coldwater Canyon home just to ask what gave with the girl. Betty was anything but uncooperative. Technically she was still on the job. The house was filled with utter confusion. Two fan magazine writers and several studio photographers had beaten me there. Flash bulbs were popping merrily all over the place. Sundry people wandered through the house seeking back-grounds for more pictures. A poodle bounded around with little Victoria.

Betty herself was busier than the proverbial one-armed paper hanger with the itch. She was answering questions, posing for camera boys, and keeping a weather eye on Vicky all at the same time. She considered this part of her job, and was glad to do it.

"Betty," I said, "practically every comic wants to play Hamlet. Every song and dance girl wants a crack at a straight dramatic role. Why did you turn down the opportunity?"

"For a very simple reason," she replied with a laugh. "I've spent 12 years learning how to sing and dance. I know musicals better than any phase of show business. My exhibitors want them; my fans expect to see me in them. I have no ambition to become a Sarah Bernhardt—praise be! So I want to stick to musicals."

THAT made sense to me, and evidently to the studio also. Betty wasn't punished. But time passed; conditions changed. Last year Betty balked at doing The Girl Next Door. This time, to the surprise of all of us, the studio put her on suspension, which means she was taken off salary.

I was out of town at the time; and one of my staff members, thinking the incident routine news, called Betty to check on what had happened. She explained that she'd just finished a film on Tuesday and was scheduled to start the new one the following Monday.

"I did not refuse to do the picture, because I hadn't even read the script," she added. "I'd been on call at the studio for 18 straight months. I needed a rest and asked for time off before starting back to work. I was told I could have the vacation, but that I'd be suspended if I took it. After being at 20th for 11 years, I was hurt by the studio's attitude. Then I was asked to promise to do another picture four months later. My reply was: 'As long as I'm being taken off salary, I'm not promising anything.'"

When that appeared in my column, the studio blew its top. I didn't know it at the time, but 20th was right on the verge of making drastic cuts in its executives' salaries. The lot was as jumpy as a fox in a forest fire. June Haver took over the picture; but she was injured while making it. The film hasn't been finished yet.

Learning the furor that Betty's statement had caused, I asked Darryl Zanuck for the studio's side of the story. He was iored by Betty's attitude. Twentieth had been good to Betty. She was kept on full salary while she had both of her babies. Usually when a studio learns that a star is expecting, she goes automatically on layoff until after the baby is born.

With theaters closing, I also had to agree with Darryl that the movie industry was in a state of emergency; we were fighting for our professional lives. And it behooved everybody in the industry to chip in and do their part.

Betty, however, stuck to her guns. She remained on suspension for a year and got a big kick out of her vacation. She and Harry indulged in their favorite pastime, following the races. And strangely enough during this period their horses hit a winning streak, which meant more to Betty than an Oscar.

She was taken off suspension to do The Farmer Takes A Wife, with Dale Robertson. "I had a wonderful time making that one," Betty told me. Then along came a picture, Blaze Of Glory, which was supposed to star Richard Widmark and Shelley Winters. But before a camera could turn on it, somebody tipped me that Shell had been to see an obstetrician. "Uh-uh," I said, "the gal's expecting." I checked for verification and printed the story. I'll bet Shell could bite my ears off for that. She wanted to do that picture badly; but gathering news is my business; and Shell would have endangered herself by making the film.

It's a strenuous picture, being directed by a rough and ready guy, Sam Fuller, who believes in a lot of close-ups and the use of no doubles. The girl gets pushed around through the whole story; and in one sequence takes a terrific beating. Sam wasn't going to take a chance of having Shell injured. Betty Grable replaced her. This time she definitely refused to make the picture, and was again put on suspension. Jean Peters replaced her. "It's the greatest part I ever had," she told me. "I play a sexy moron who falls in love with a pickpocket." Jean, who's as healthy as a young colt, can take anything dished out to her in the way of physical punishment.

Now the rumors began to fly. Betty Grable was tired of picture making; didn't care about her career; had gone temperamental; Zanuck was going to lower the boom on her, but good this time; Marilyn Monroe had been brought in as a threat to the blonde queen of the lot; Betty was peeved because Gentlemen Prefer Blondes had gone to Marilyn rather than her; Grable had figured that she'd grown so powerful she could do as she pleased; she was still afraid to tackle a straight dramatic role. These were just a few of the conjectures that floated around town. Seeking the truth, I went directly to Betty. She was not bitter over the suspension, having expected it when she turned down the part.

"I think I've lasted in this business by not doing pictures that are not good for me," said she. "My fans expect to see me in a certain type of film and I try never to let them down. In Blaze Of Glory, I was to play a B-girl who picks up men in bars and works for a fellow traveler. Can you see me doing that? I don't think my fans would want to see me in that kind of a role. I've never played a character on the screen that I would be ashamed for my own children to see—or the children of any other mother either. Then, too, the picture was to be made in black and white; so many of mine have been in color that I may have become spoiled."

"You weren't afraid to tackle a straight dramatic role?" I asked.

"No," she said. Then she pondered the question. "No, I'm really not, though two of my most dismal failures were pictures in which I played dramatic roles. And, of course, my biggest successes have been musicals. Let's face it, Hedda. Very little acting is required of me in most of the films I do. However, I'd welcome the opportunity to play the kind of parts Carole Lombard used to do. But I suppose nobody believes I can do comedy." "No plans of retiring then?" I asked. The question startled her. "Oh, no," she said. "I love working in pictures. In fact, with Harry on tour and the children in school, I'd like to be making one right now."

I wanted to know if there was any feud between her and Marilyn Monroe.

"Absolutely none," she said. "A lot of people think I'm jealous of Marilyn; but that's not true. I was told Gentlemen Prefer Blondes was bought for me; and naturally I wanted to make the picture. Who wouldn't? Marilyn got it. That's her good fortune. When Judy Garland bowed out of Annie Get Your Gun, I was dying to take over. But 20th wouldn't lend me. Do you realize that in the 13 years I've been with that studio, I've never made a picture off the lot?"

I hadn't, but it's true. And the girl who's in a position to ramble around town gets the plum roles, as no studio can have all the good properties. Betty Hutton, on loan-out from Paramount, had her career revitalized by Annie for example. In order to have more freedom to pick and choose, Betty's asked 20th to release her from her contract. But the studio won't do it. Who wants to let go of a gold mine?

AND just what makes this gold mine click? That's the question that has long puzzled us. She's quietly skipped most of the usual formulas for movie success. Betty, while having a healthy respect for her fans, does not cater to them like Joan Crawford, for instance. She has her fan clubs, however, and a surprisingly great number of feminine followers. Girls who wrote to Betty in their teens grow up, marry, and become mothers; but they still correspond with Grable. "The reason women like her," one of her friends told me, "is that she looks like a square shooter. She's the kind of girl with whom about any woman would trust her husband. You couldn't say that about Marilyn Monroe."

When Betty's working in a picture, she's all business. But away from the studio she likes to be just Mrs. Harry James. She used to accompany Harry on his band tours; but fans wouldn't let her alone. She wanted to be simply another wife. But if she didn't make a personal appearance, get up and take a bow or sing, people thought her snooty. So in order not to offend them, she decided to skip those tours with Harry.

Betty's no glamor girl when you compare her to Marlene Dietrich or Rita Hayworth. She dresses simply but well. When she goes out, she wears no make-up except a little powder, mascara and lipstick. I've known Betty for many years; and she seems ageless. Her figure has remained exactly the same for 12 years. The onepiece suit she uses for rehearsals has never had to be altered a fraction of an inch. Yet she never diets. When she's rehearsing dance numbers, she eats like a famished horse—particularly candy. Betty keeps her skin fresh, firm, and unwrinkled by frequent applications of cream and oil. George Lane, her studio make-up man, says she presents only one minor problem. Her nose was once broken, leaving a tiny bone slightly projecting. When that part of her face is high-lighted, the nose-bone requires special make-up.

Betty doesn't consider herself a real beauty. Nor do I. Yet during World War II, 20th had over two million requests for pin-up pictures of her from servicemen. I know, because my office was constantly flooded with letters from GI's wanting Grable's picture. Somehow she meant home to the lonely men in foreign lands, because she's the standard concept of the all-American girl. She's the "beautiful blonde" about whom all men dream and which most women envy. Yet she'd never win a "Miss America" contest. Hollywood is loaded with girls more beautiful than she. Go on any set where a big musical number is being shot; and you'll find dozens of them. They're playing extras.

Her looks help, but that is not the answer to Betty Grable's appeal. And she'd be the first to admit that she's no great shakes as an actress. When the Harvard Lampoon picked her as "the worst actress of the year," she wired the magazine, "You're so right." She can be a show-stopper with her warm vitality; but putting her in a picture with a Greta Garbo or Olivia De Havilland would be murderous. Dan Dailey has done several pictures with Betty, and I asked him what the girl had that kept her so popular.

"Warmth," he said. "You know, in real life Betty's shy and does not reveal her true personality. I've always felt that what we see on the screen is not the actress, but Betty Grable herself. She has the greatest natural gift for dancing that I've ever found in a woman; but she's never fully developed it. The same applies to her acting. You know why? Making motion pictures is strictly a business with her. She likes the money and does enough on the sound stages to get by in a big way. But her chief interest lies in buying the family groceries and washing the faces of her children."

I'M inclined to agree with Dan. I asked why she didn't make personal appearances. "Lack of confidence, I suppose," she replied.

"Lack of confidence!" I echoed in disbelief. "You've been with bands and on the stage."

"But that was long ago," she said. "I had to walk out on a stage now, I'd be terrified. I've been blamed for not playing benefits, and that's the reason. I know people would expect me to be as good as I am on the screen; and I wouldn't be. I don't want to disappoint anybody."

As for being a homebody, Betty certainly is. At present she has no secretary, business manager, nurse, cook or chauffeur. She does have an agent, a girl to take care of her fan mail, and a man to handle her taxes. "I learned to do things for myself when I was young, and I still like to be independent," she explained. Marie Brasselle (mother of film star Keefe) has been Betty's hairdresser for 12 years and knows her about as intimately as anyone outside her family. "She doesn't want anybody to wait on her," says Marie. "She won't even let me carry her script. Betty doesn't like flattery either. If she looks especially good, I tell her so. But she'd hate for anybody to tell her that every day."

Betty is stern with her children when they do wrong; so they have become models of behavior. When not working she takes care of them herself. Betty prepares their breakfast. They have a salad for lunch; and at night mother and daughters dine out.

The Jameses do little entertaining. They both loathe the night clubs. Betty got her fill of them in her younger days; and Harry has to work in them. Occasionally they do a night spot to catch the show of a pal like Joe E. Lewis. "With two children, we have enough entertainment at home," says Betty. Many movie stars feel that they must be seen in public gatherings to remain popular. Betty defies the idea. About the only place you see them regularly in public are race tracks. They both love horses; have six racers and four brood mares of their own. "The nicest present Harry ever gave me," says Betty, "was a three-in-one affair—a mare in foal with a second colt trotting by her side."

I'm surprised at the number of men who don't consider Betty sexy; but I can understand their viewpoint. Sultry, languid, lazy Marilyn Monroe can get more sex in the shrug of her shoulder than Grable could in a hula dance. Yet when the current storm over Marilyn is over, I'll still have my money on Betty. Some psychological factor in the public mind makes it accept or reject a movie star. Bob Mitchum served a term in jail and came out to find his career unaffected. John Agar did the same thing and practically wrecked his.

Their deeds may be perfectly innocent as, for instance, getting married. Betty's movie career suffered not at all by her becoming a wife and mother. I doubt whether Marilyn's could withstand such. There's a difference. Betty represents entertainment. People associate her with bright lights, music, crowds, gaiety. She's the girl men like to take out dining and dancing—everybody's girl friend, but nobody's girl. But smouldering Marilyn is the type with whom men like to be alone. She's associated with dim lights, soft music, an open fire, champagne in an icy silver bucket. Marriage would likely destroy that concept. Doubtlessly Marilyn will wed, knocking the cream off her publicity pie, while Betty continues dancing on her merry way.

GRABLE is smart enough to know that the workers behind the camera can make or break a star. Good lighting, good make-up, good wardrobe are essential to the success of any actress. And Betty never forgets the people responsible for them. "When she's working," says Marie Bras-selle, "she has gallons of hot coffee on the set for everybody all day long. She discovered that a crew member liked fishing; so she sent him to a sports store to pick out anything he liked as a present from her. She knew her wardrobe girl was fond of pretty clothes. So she sent her to Sak's to pick out some new dresses for herself at Grable's expense. She learned that I didn't have a television set, and gave me a beauty.

Dan Dailey calls her a 50-50 girl. "Whether we were doing a dance number or acting a scene together," says he, "she never tried to top me. She gave me as much as she took."

Betty's often been accused of being temperamental and moody. At times when I meet her, she'll sit down and talk my ears off; at others, she'll have practically nothing to say. "She's not moody," says Marie. "She's sensitive. And her silence is likely due to something entirely unrelated to you. If she's hurt, she clams up for a couple of days. But she gets over it." Another factor that gives her a reputation for temperament is that she believes in punctuality. She likes to get to work on time and quit on time so she can get home to her family. Directors often wish to stay over time to finish a particular shot. Betty doesn't like the idea; so she blows up. "Temperament," say people working with her. "The great Grable. Who does she think she is? Garbo?"

BETTY thinks no such thing. At six o'clock in the evening she ceases being an actress and becomes a mother. So there you have her. Of herself she says, "I'm a good, dull girl." As an actress and singer she's but mediocre as talent goes. She's not the best dancer in the business; nor is she the most beautiful girl. Her private life is far from glamorous. But she's one of the greatest boxoffice stars in motion picture history. Why? I'll tell you her secret. She started studying dancing at the age of five and began working professionally at 11. She knows show business and how to dish it out. That's it! END

(Continued from page 37) months ahead of him. Vittorio and I had dinner with Elizabeth and Michael the other evening. She looks wonderful. The boys talked European theater and we talked babies. I can't get a thing zipped up any more and Elizabeth advised me where to get maternity clothes. But I don't know. I'll wait. We had a lot of laughs."

The executive from the studio smiled appreciatively. Shelley's interior decorator, who was passing through, nodded pleasantly to everyone and headed for the room tentatively designated as the nursery. Mrs. Rose Schrift, Shelley's mother, brought her a cup of tea and warned, "It's hot." Naturally, Shelley took a sip anyway and winced. She always has to find out things for herself—that much she hasn't changed. "It's hot," she agreed.

That day, for instance, nothing had seemed to work out right about the apartment, including the Japanese gardener who again doggedly showed up at dawn to noisily water the plants despite their protests. ("Why does he have to sneak up on them in the dark?" Shelley asked). Besides this, and the fireplace's need for modernizing, the water heater had made ominous noises, the shower leaked. ("How do you fix a washer?" Shelley had phoned the plumber.) The pipes of the hot air heating system needed cleaning. ("Do they send a furry little cat through the pipes?" Shelley wondered.) A man came to deliver two bags of fertilizer nobody could remember ordering. Someone else bought venetian blinds which didn't fit; and a neighbor who knew Shelley dropped in and told her the other neighbors on the street thought her husband was crazy.

THROUGH all this Shelley remained serene, only mildly interested about the household disruption involved and just casually amused about the neighbors.

"Vittorio only sounds crazy," she said. "He is rehearsing for his plays in Italy and he has to get back his old voice power because they don't use microphones even when they play in those old Roman amphitheaters to audiences of 50,000 people. He does vocal exercises every day till the windows rattle. Up the street there is a neurologist, and every time he hears Vittorio he grabs his surgical kit in the hope I'll call him over to operate. He thinks Vittorio will make a fascinating case."

"Doesn't it bother you?" she was asked. "Uh-uh," Shelley replied. "The only thing that bothers either one of us is the door. It squeaks when Vittorio is trying to study his plays. He yells about it, and I pour oil all over the hinges, but there is always a little squeak I miss."

"What's happened to you, then?" came another question. "Where is the good old Winters temperament? I heard you didn't even get angry when 20th Century-Fox phoned you in Mexico that the picture you were to do with Richard Widmark had been cancelled. And that, they tell me, was before you even knew yourself you were going to have a baby."

Shelley smiled blissfully. "It's physiological, the doctor says," she replied. "The glands pour something into the blood and then you don't care what the score is. It's a good thing the studios can't get hold of the stuff. I didn't know the baby was on the way in Mexico, but it was. That's why 20th's notification didn't bother me. I'm having the first vacation I have ever had since I was 12 years old and I love it. I'm even taking naps now. Me! I never even sat down before during the day. And nights? I used to be a real nightclub girl. Now Vittorio has to hit me on the head to keep me up after dinner . . . he should dare to try!"

"Well, after the baby is born you'll be your old self again," her friend ventured.

Shelley thought a while. "I don't know. I've got ideas now I don't think I'll forget afterwards—a brand new way of seeing things. I'm beginning to feel that a career is not all of life. If you keep dwelling on it it becomes everything, but that kind of everything can be pretty empty."

THAT'S how it is with Shelley. Her personality adjustment to approaching motherhood is intriguing everyone, including Shelley herself. She is proud of the fact that three times during September she got new picture offers and was able to turn them down without the least personal dither and without automatically canvassing a dozen and a half of her friends for advice. She was tempted by one of the offers, a chance to play opposite Dick Basehart in an independent production entitled, Cry Tough.

"If you take this role and start the picture you will have to finish it, and in your condition this might prove difficult," Vittorio warned.

"You mean I've got to face the facts of life?" she asked.

When he nodded she decided. "Okay, life wins . . . I won't even start."

Shelley's new mood seems to embrace Vittorio as well, so that he too appears surrounded by an aura of gentle reasonableness. This helps wet down the dust of any conflict that does arise. One arose about their travel plans. Vittorio had his heart set on Shelley accompanying him to Italy in October when he returned for a five-months engagement with his play company there. Shelley was to stay right through Christmas and then return to Hollywood so that the baby could be born in the United States. Vittorio was to follow in April when his show closed, bringing his mother along. But her doctor advised Shelley not to attempt the trip until November, and when she reported this to Vittorio he couldn't understand it.

"Why?" he asked. "You get on a plane, you sit, and then you are in Rome."

"The doctor says it's not wise to travel until the fifth month," she told him.

Vittorio waved a deprecating hand. "Italian girls who are going to be mothers must be tougher," he declared. "They go anywhere anytime."

Shelley just nodded agreeably. Then Vittorio demanded to know whether she was going to do what he said or what the doctor said.

"What the doctor said," she replied.

Vittorio opened his mouth as if to pronounce some ultimatum . . . and then incipient fatherhood must have taken control of him. "Good girl . . ." he said. "We have to be careful."

There was also the question of Shelley holding to some sort of diet. Her doctor didn't want her to put on more than 20 or 25 pounds during pregnancy, and she had already gained 10 by the beginning of the third month. Vittorio, however, claimed that in Italy mothers-to-be gained up to 50 pounds and nobody cared.

He produced a pencil and paper and did some figuring. "You think not?" he asked. "If by the third month you have already gained ten pounds, and you are hardly started yet. . . ."

"Yes?" prompted Shelley, pretending she didn't know what he was leading up to.

"I am afraid you are having this baby on the Italian plan," he said.

THE mysterious ailments which sometimes affect expectant fathers as well as mothers had not bypassed Vittorio before he left Hollywood. For one thing, he suffered from indigestion, something new for him, and he claimed it was a sympathetic reaction to Shelley's condition. He began to complain when he noticed that she was making a habit of popping from bed right to the kitchen the first thing every morning. "It's like a track race every morning with you," he said. "Why?"

She told him that her doctor had advised eating immediately after arising to settle her stomach and prevent nausea. Vittorio smote his chest. "Why didn't you tell me before?" he demanded. "Me too. I have been having heartburn ever since we found out about the baby."

The next morning he beat her to the kitchen. The day after that, when she went to take some vitamin pills her doctor had prescribed, Vittorio followed right behind. He flipped a whole handful of the pills into his mouth before she could stop him. "They're not for heartburn," she told him.

"That's all right," he said. "I am interested in American medicine generally."

Their original idea of buying the duplex apartment was to live in the ground floor apartment themselves and rent the upstairs apartment for income. But right from the first Vittorio began to discourage possible tenants. When Shelley asked him why, he reminded her that his mother would be with them. "It will be a good place for mother to live and a good place for the baby," he said.

"But won't you want the baby to be downstairs with us?" she asked.

Vittorio looked as if he couldn't understand her. "What for?" he asked. "There is nothing you can say to a baby until he is five years old."

Shelley laughs this off, of course. Baby is going to stay very close to mama and papa, the way she sees the parental program. What has bothered her is the probability of the child's speaking Italian.

"If this is the case, you won't be able to talk with him at all unless you learn Italian," Vittorio has teased.

Shelley is taking no chances. She is studying hard. She has also obtained the University of Chicago recommended "Great Books of the Western World," in 54 volumes, and intends to read every one of them.

"Anything my kid wants to know, from Homer to Tennessee Williams, I'm going to be able to tell him," she says.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

One afternoon as we were playing baseball, we noticed a beautiful brunette watching us. Only after talking to her for a while did we discover that this friendly person was Jane Russell, who was living in Columbus while her husband was stationed at Fort Benning.

Sybil Powell
Columbus, Georgia

To get time for this, she has quit working on a sweater for Vittorio which she has been knitting for five months and which is still one sleeve short of being all finished.

EVEN if some of Vittorio's ideas are a little hard to take, all in all he is making a fine prospective father, according to Shelley. Although he was born in a home where a nurse attended his wants from infancy on (and still does when he visits his own family), he forgot all about this the day they moved to their new place.

"He started off normal," she said. "He refused to get out of bed when the movers came in the morning. But afterwards he made a great finish, even washing the dishes and taking out the garbage."

Their worst day, she says, came the afternoon they both went to her doctor to discuss the money end of parenthood. The doctor wanted to know Vittorio's income for the past five years so he could establish an average on which to base the fee. When Vittorio heard what the fee was to be, Shelley saw his lips moving in the way they do when he is mentally converting dollars into lira. From the expression on his face, it looked to her as if he was up into the millions of them. After they got home, Shelley made him a drink and he became fairly philosophic about his fate.

"Still," he said, "births in America and births in Italy are entirely different phenomena. In Italy if you want a baby it is merely a matter of love. In America you have to be deaf to your heart until your bank book says, 'Okay! Go ahead and have a baby!'"

"Except if you are an Italian in America," murmured Shelley.

No, at this writing Shelley is about the calmest girl in Hollywood. When Farley Granger heard about her good fortune, he came over and brought flowers. After he left Shelley said, "Gee, he's a nice guy. It's a shame Vittorio and he can't be friends." (Vittorio is the one who is doing the balking.) Then she shrugged her shoulders.

"Oh, well," she commented, and you knew that was not going to bother her either.

END

what's the trouble esther?

Ben, who was once a radio announcer and consequently talks with great fluidity, was a little more detailed in his denial. "Esther and I," he explained, "have read so many of these darn items about ourselves, they don't bother us anymore. You know why they print this stuff, don't you? They've run out of things to write about us. After all, pick up the front page of your newspaper. You don't read anything about Mr. and Mrs. Glutz celebrating their tenth wedding anniversary. That's not news. You read scandal about divorcees, law suits, murders—those are the things that sell newspapers—not happiness.

"Esther and I happen to be happily married and well-adjusted. I'd say as well as any couple in town. Is that worth any kind of a story? You know the answer. Of course not. But run something like Esther Williams and Ben Gage are breaking up—right away it's hot stuff.

"If there was anything wrong with our marriage, I mean seriously wrong—if it were going on the rocks—I'm the kind of guy who would level with you. But it isn't. Ask Esther. Ask her mother. Ask anyone. The trouble is that these columnists have done all the stories they can do about a happy marriage. Now they've gotta concentrate and dig up a little dirt."

BEN's explanation sounded rational. "Only," I asked, "why should they pick on you and Esther? Why don't they pick on someone say, like Loretta Young and Tom Lewis, or Bob and Dolores Hope? Is there a possibility that many members of the Press don't like Esther? A year or so ago the Hollywood Women's Press Club voted her the most uncooperative actress of the year. Are these stories of your breakup examples of wishful thinking?"

Ben thought for a moment. "I honestly think," he said, "if you asked the membership of the Hollywood Women's Press Club if they'd made a mistake about Esther, they'd say yes. Quite a few of those girls resigned after that wacky nomination. Esther is as cooperative with the Press as circumstances permit. Don't take my word for it. Just ask about town."

I did exactly that, and from what I can gather, the Press feels that Esther Williams is a pretty good scout. "She'll give you as much time as she can," one reporter confided, "but to her the most important thing is her family, especially her two kids. Her one regret in life is that she can't spend more time than she does with her boys. She's always late for appointments, and she may be a little over-anxious about earning a buck—but she's a whole lot more normal than someone like Ava Gardner who's a real mixed-up dame, or Lana Turner who has about as much judgment of men as a mink. I think you can say this about Esther. The newspapermen genuinely like her. The newspaper women, however—I think they've got green eyes.

"The one trouble with Esther is that she's a success. It's a national hobby, taking potshots at a success, especially when the girl had nothing to begin with. Esther's story is one of those rags-to-riches yarns. No one criticizes the son of J. P. Morgan. Such a kid is born to the purple and no one ever accuses him of being money-mad, aggressive, selfish, egotistical, and inconsiderate.

"Let someone like Esther come along, a kid who never had an extra buck as a child, and right away a lot of other girls resent her success."

A HOLLYWOOD newspaper girl who's been covering the goings-on in movietown for more than six years had a different explanation for the oft-repeated rumors concerning the eventual unhappy denouement of Esther's second marriage.

"Look," she said, "let's start on the premise that all single girls are jealous of married girls, and all women insanely jealous of beautiful actresses. Let's shove that premise aside and concentrate on Esther. I've done quite a bit of research on Esther, and I've come to the conclusion that she's a pretty domineering sort of girl.

"I don't think there's anything necessarily wrong in a girl being dominant. After all, we're just the result of our inheritance and environment. It so happens that Esther's mother is a pretty domineering woman herself. I remember asking people in Inglewood, where Esther was raised, about her family. They all told me the same thing. Esther's mother was the driving force. Her father was a poor sign-painter who found the going pretty tough, that is financially. Esther inherited her mother's drive, her mother's forcefulness. She's a plain-speaking, hard-working girl who calls a spade a spade.

"It's her industry, her money, her earnings, her career which in large part is responsible for the family holdings. For example, Esther and Ben own the Trails, a restaurant out on Sepulveda Boulevard in Los Angeles. It's done so well that Esther and Ben are expanding it into a drive-in. They also own a metal fabrication shop, half-a-dozen houses down in the desert which Esther built in the first place so that her asthmatic brother would have something to look after, another house in Acapulco which they rent out, and I guess some sort of royalty deal with a bathing suit manufacturer. At one time they also owned a filling station at 18th and Montana in Santa Monica; I'll never forget the night they opened that station. They had searchlights and Keenan Wynn on his bicycle and they were giving away tanks of free gas to other Hollywood stars.

"I happened to stop by another filling station in the neighborhood, and the youngster who was running it was choked with bitterness. 'That Esther Williams is a pip,' he complained. 'She only earns $100,000 a year, but she's gotta open up a filling station and take away my business. I know it's a free country. Anyone can open anything. But somehow, I just resent it. I resent it, 'cause I know she doesn't need the money. It's just another sideline to her, while to me it's my whole living.'

"Esther and Ben gave up the filling station, but my whole point in telling you about their holdings is this: Esther is the dominant wage-earner in her family. Ben looks after their various interests. He had a small run as a singer on the radio, and as an emcee on television, but he abandoned show-business.

"It may be unfair but he is regarded more as Esther Williams' husband than as Ben Gage. He knew this was bound to happen when he married Esther. He knew she wasn't going to abandon her career and let him become the family bread-winner. He went into the setup with his eyes open.

"I maintain that eventually he is going to regret having left show business. After all, he's tall, he's handsome, he's got a lot of sex appeal. If he were willing to struggle a little, who could tell what heights he might achieve? He's given up whatever chance he had in show business to look after the joint family holdings. These may expand to include 5,000 different restaurants, but Esther will always be the power behind the throne. Eventually, and mind you, this is my own personal opinion, I think Ben's male vanity will assert itself, that unconsciously and gradually, he will resent Esther for depriving him of the chance he himself failed to take in show business. Do I make myself clear?"

I mulled over my informant's opinion for a good while. "You don't mean to say," I questioned, "that on the basis of this analysis which may be faulty you have been running breakup stories about the Gages?"

The newspaper girl looked at me and sadly shook her head. "It's very simple," she explained. "History repeats itself. I've yet to see a happy marriage out here where the wife was infinitely more successful in her career than her husband. 92 In those marriages that do last, either the wife or the husband must abandon one career. Lots of times a man will marry an actress and become her manager in which event he not only becomes her husband but also a paid employee. Sid Luft and Judy Garland are a case in point. Rosalind Russell also has a husband who helps produce many of her pictures. Tom Lewis has just organized a television company which will star his wife Loretta Young.

"I maintain that the masculine ego resents being placed in a subsidiary role and that eventually it will revolt—maybe not in all cases—after all, a question of character is concerned—but in most cases. The reason many gossip columnists keep predicting the demise of Esther Williams' marriage is a simple one. Through her ambition and industry she is more successful than her husband. I don't say this is a fault, a crime, or anything. I merely say it's dangerous. Why don't you talk to someone who knew Esther when she was first married to that struggling young doctor?"

I searched around Los Angeles and had no trouble in finding several persons who knew Esther when she was the young doctor's wife. One of these persons remembers Esther when she lived at 8722 Orchard Street in Inglewood. In fact, she attended school with the actress and says that Esther today is a far better wife,

A Hollywood screenwriter was outlining to Sam Goldwyn and others a story treatment he had about the 7th Cavalry. Goldwyn frequently seems absorbed in something other than that which is being discussed. The screenwriter, trying to recapture the producer's attention, said, "Of course, you're familiar with the details of Custer's Last Stand?" ... "Sure," Goldwyn replied, "Custer lost."

*Leonard Lyons in

more mature, more intelligent, more philosophical than when she was married to the young doctor who was more interested in research than in making money.

"Look," she told me. "I think Esther Williams is wonderful. I've heard an awful lot of stories of how she values money above everything and all of that baloney. It's not true. She has a good common sense of values. In her scheme of things, money is important—but she was raised without very much of it—and she never knew an easy childhood. I can vouch for that because I lived in the same neighborhood.

"I remember when she worked in a local store selling underthings on Saturdays and during vacations. I remember when she was a stock girl in a department store on Wilshire Boulevard, earning $80 a month. She and her sister used to save admission to the public swimming pool by counting out towels.

In high school at the beginning she was pretty unhappy. She was tall and gangling and none of the boys made a play for her. Towards the end, however, she began going around with some of her brother's friends and getting elected to various school offices, and by the time she got out she was pretty darn popular—but she never had it easy. I think she was 15 when the Los Angeles Athletic Club became interested in her as a swimmer. They sent her out to Des Moines, and I think she was 17 or 18 when she won the 100-meter free style event. But as she once told me, 'You can't earn money as an amateur athlete,' so she gave up swimming and got a job in the department store. That's when Billy Rose offered her $40 a week to swim in his World's Fair Aquacade.

"She turned it down telling him, 'I can't give up the security of my job for $40 a week.' Rose finally came across with $125 a week, and Esther took him up on it.

"While she was swimming with Johnny Weissmuller, Sam Katz, a producer at MGM, and Johnny Hyde, he was the agent from the William Morris office who later discovered and developed Marilyn Monroe—tried to get her into the movies—only Esther wouldn't listen. That's what I mean by common sense. She knew she'd had no dramatics training, and she couldn't see what use she'd be in the movies. She told them no, and after the Aquacade, she got her same old job back in the department store over on Wilshire Boulevard.

"Johnny Hyde used to bother her every month or so to come over to see L. B. Mayer—he was head of MGM, you know. He wanted Esther to have an interview with Mr. Mayer. He felt strongly that Esther could be turned into a big box-office attraction. Esther went with him one day—she was 19 at the time—and Mayer's first reaction was, 'My, but you're tall.' Esther said, 'I certainly am,' and she tried to leave his office, but Mayer ran after her and said, 'Wait a minute, young lady, you're not that tall.' He liked her face and her figure, and he took a chance. That's how Esther became a movie star.

"Now when she married this young doctor, it wasn't a case of running away from parental authority or anything like that—it was love, or what Esther thought was love. I don't see any sense in mentioning his name, do you? Ben gets absolutely livid, you know, when anyone mentions his name or even the fact that Esther was married before. I don't know why, but he certainly does. Anyway, it's no easy job being a young doctor. It takes years before you start earning a decent living. I think Esther would have put up with the early struggle and everything else, but she just fell out of love. Luckily she fell into a career almost at the same time.

"You ask me if I think there's any possibility of a breakup in Esther's present marriage. Right now I'd say definitely not. Esther and Ben are both on a solid plane. They know what they want out of this marriage. It's a family, and they're building one. Esther wants a girl, and next time out she'll probably get one.

"Ben may kid around a lot, and because he's so big he's always a target for jokes and wisecracks, but really, he's an awful good father. The other morning he took little Benjie down to the Hill and Dale Nursery, and I'm telling you the both of them looked real cute. Esther is as hard-working an actress as you'll find in this town. Being a wife, mother, and actress is no easy job. At the end of a day she's really all in. But she always has time for the sick and the handicapped, like teaching little blind children to swim and performing for the paraplegics.

"I read those gossip items from time to time about Ben and Esther—but I also see a lot of these two kids, and I can tell you their marriage is working. Insofar as those darn gossipmongers are concerned the trouble with Esther Williams is that there's no trouble. She's happy, Ben's happy, the children are happy—and that's all there is to it."

AND that's all they have to work on, those gossip columnists who, for some perverse reason refuse to believe that any family can be happy in Hollywood. And refuse to allow anyone else to believe it either.

(Esther Williams will soon be seen in MGM's Million Dollar Mermaid.)

IS GINGER ROGERS READY TO NOD "I DO" TO HER JACQUES? . . .

LOUELLA PARSONS'

So many things happened at Marion Davies' fabulous party that all things seem to date from that night.

Lana Turner and Fernando Lamas had the big battle which ended their romance that evening. There have been varying stories given out as to the reason for the fight, but I happen to know that Lana said to Lex Barker, "Why don't you ask me to dance?" He danced with her not once but twice. Fernando cut in on them the second time round, and told Lana everything was over.

This soirée, which has probably never been equalled in Hollywood, or in many other places for that matter, was the first affair Marion has given since she became Mrs. Horace Brown. There were 500 guests invited but closer to a 1,000 came. Cars were driven right into a cellophane tent, which covered a great section of garden and a fish pond, so there was no way of checking who were the invited guests and who weren't. Champagne flowed as if it were a nickel a bottle. The party is said to have cost $25,000 but it wouldn't surprise me if it actually came to double that amount.

Wherever you looked there were bars, gardenia and orchid trees, ten feet tall and in full bloom, and orchid corsages for each feminine guest. On the vast buffet tables, there was every kind of food. Three rooms in the house were turned into reproductions of New York nightclubs—the "Stork," "21" and "El Morocco." Three orchestras played continually. To try to enumerate the guests is impossible, but you can take it from me that everyone who was invited accepted and many brought along a couple of friends.

The most resplendent of the jewels worn were those adorning the Queen Mother of Egypt. Her necklace is one of the most costly in the world, out-Hoping the Hope diamond.

I almost forgot to say the guests of honor were Marilyn and Johnnie "Cry" Ray, the newlyweds. Charles Morrison, the poppa-in-law, and owner of the Mocambo, planned the party and believe me, he spared no expense.

Ava Gardner, who has become very friendly with Lana Turner, was much in evidence, though she came unescorted. That was before Ava had her battle with Frankie, which was to end in a temporary reconciliation. In one of the "nightclubs" Red Skelton put on what amounted to a one-man show. In another, Johnnie Ray sang, of course—and, as dawn came, it was really out of this world, seeing the newcomers like Debbie Reynolds and Piper Laurie staring fascinated at the old-timers like Joe E. Brown—and vice versa.

Into the trunk goes Jonet Leigh with an assist from Tony Curtis. This was just prior to going into their magic act at a Hollywood charity party. Since Tony made Houdini, he's in constant demand to make magic everywhere he goes.

Bandleader Spike Jones threw a party for expectant fathers Georgy Steffen and Michael Wilding. Spike, with his wife Helen, felt that the girls—Jane Powell and Liz Taylor—were getting too much attention, so they "baby showered" the boys.

THE NEW ANNIE BAXTER'S NOT WHAT SHE USED TO BE!

GOOD NEWS

Recently Marion Davies gave a party for some neighbors, the Rays. It cost $25,000, all of Hollywood was there, and . . . wonder of all wonders . . . Marian and hubby (left) found time to greet guests of honor Mr. and Mrs. Johnnie Ray.

Judy Garland and Van Johnson met Fred Brisson at supper at the Marion Davies party. Judy, Sid Luft and Van were among the 500 invited guests (almost 1,000 showed up). Gardenia and orchid trees, ten feet tall, made a background.

Debra Paget got into the act at the annual Masquers Ball held at the RKO Pantages Theater in Hollywood. She came as a typical showgirl to the extravaganza.

Rita Hayworth and an unidentified escort had a gay old time in a restaurant on the Champs-Elysees in Paris. Rita refused to give the gentleman's name. A new romance?

Rhonda Fleming was fascinated by the tiny little orchid all the lady guests received at a recent Hollywood party. Rhonda attended with her husband, Dr. Lew Morrell.

Lona and Fernando made one of Hollywood's hottest combinations for weeks, both on and off-screen. They were due to marry when her divorce became final.

Fernando actually wasn't closing his eyes to what went on around him at the Morion Dovies party. Shortly after this, Lona asked Lex Barker to dance with her and Fernando thought they overdid it. They fought, said next day they were through.

THESE LANA AND LAMAS PICTURES ILLUSTRATE THE FAMOUS MOVIE FORMULA: BOY MEETS GIRL. BOY LOSES GIRL. BOY GETS ANOTHER GIRL. FOR THE COMPLETE STORY, SEE PAGE 37 FOR "THE END OF THE AFFAIR"

IN my time I've taken some digs at Shelley Winters, which I felt she deserved. But I must say I have never felt so sorry for any girl in my whole life as I do for Shelley right now.

She is madly in love with Vittorio Gassman, but he had to return to Rome for a six-months' previous engagement to play Hamlet. Meanwhile, Shelley's having a very hard time. She's had a number of blood transfusions. Her baby won't be born until March, and it is imperative that she have her own American doctor.

This means Vittorio can't be with her when the baby arrives, though the plan now is to send his mother here. He is booked in Rome to May.

JACQUES Bergerac, who landed himself on Leo the Lion's dotted line via Ginger Rogers, was sued for beating up a man in Paris and received a suspended sentence.

"How about it?" someone at MGM asked him.

Jacques, handsome, 25-year-old Frenchman, said, "I had a lady friend and when I wanted to break off our romance she hired someone to beat me. I got in the first punch and knocked out his teeth."

I must say the young man certainly was frank. Ginger doesn't mind the girls in his past life—she's got him now, and I'll be surprised if they don't marry.

ALL Hollywood was shocked, and I lost a very dear personal friend, in the sudden death of lovely Pam Lang, wife of Jennings Lang, from a heart attack.

Pam's death was doubly tragic because she and Jennings, whom she stood by so staunchly in his time of great trouble, had found new happiness together and were making wonderful plans for the future for themselves and their two small children. Jennings, you remember, was shot by Walter Wanger in a jealous

By MARY MARATHON

Fans, if you're in the mood to "get away from it all," I'm the gal who can tell you how to do it! It doesn't have to cost you more than the price of a movie theatre ticket, a ticket that'll take you to exotic, mysterious India when you see "Thunder in the East"—and to the lush and colorful banana country when you see "Tropic Zone."

* * *

Just in time for that January pick-up, you'll be able to magic-carpet-yourself via "Thunder in the East" to a fabulously-decorated Maharajah's palace . . . to the teeming market-places of Ghandahar where evil and good rub shoulders, and where the man Alan Ladd portrays is right at home, living the kind of exciting adventures he had in "Saigon," "China" and "Calcutta."

* * *

Ladd's a gun-runner in "Thunder in the East," and while he mixes with some pretty rough characters, star-wise he's in real solid company. Deborah Kerr, Charles Boyer and Corinne Calvet share top billing with him. With two irresistible lovelies like Deborah and Corinne in the same picture, Ladd doesn't stand a chance of avoiding romantic entanglement, not that he'd want to. But I'm going on record to action-lovers that there's action in the field of romance, too!

* * *

The story centers around Ladd's efforts to sell a plane-load of guns and ammunition to the Maharajah of Ghandahar, who is momentarily expecting attack by outlaw tribesmen. Ladd didn't figure on Charles Boyer, who portrays the Maharajah's peace loving secretary and who insists the only way to meet force is with love and kindness. Boyer locks the guns away and when trouble starts, the small British colony is really up against it. There's a lot of edge-of-the-seat excitement in "Thunder in the East" that typifies adventure in far-away places, and I know it will give you the feeling of being right in the middle of one of today's hottest action spots.

* * *

For a different—and torrid!—change of scene, make a note to catch "Tropic Zone" where the action (and there's plenty of it!) takes place on a banana plantation in Puerto Barrancas. And if the name of that town doesn't sound like a cruise-stop, then I've been wasting my time reading travel-folders.

"Tropic Zone" is photographed in gorgeous Technicolor and stars rugged Ronald Reagan, lovely red-head Rhonda Fleming, and fiery singer-dancer Estelita. It has to do with the struggle between the independent banana-growers and the crooked shipping head who has designs on Rhonda's plantation. Reagan, involved with the wrong side, falls in love with Rhonda. Their romance sparks some flaming action both between the lovers and between the rival banana-growers.

* * *

Before long, I'm going to be singing you the praises of "The Stars Are Singing" . . . a music-loaded Technicolor dandy that brings you a terrific new screen personality—none other than the original "Come-On-A-My-House" girl, Rosemary Clooney! The millions of records she's sold are nothing compared with the box-office records that 'gal's gonna break! What a singin' team Rosemary, Anna Maria Alberghetti and Lauritz Melchior make! But more about that later.

* * *

Goodbye for now, fans, and happy movie-going!

rage over Lang's supposed attentions to Joan Bennett. Ironically, at the time of Pam's death, Wanger had just been released from the prison farm where he served a four months' sentence for the shooting of Lang.

As a lesson in how not to get married Ted Briskin, Betty Hutton's ex, takes my booby prize. Ted, who has never failed to telephone me ever since his and Betty's final parting, to say that he was romancing this or that glamor girl, finally got married again.

But I must say I was a little surprised when he telephoned at four A.M. to say that he and Joan Dixon had eloped! You see, it was their very first date. Joan arrived in Las Vegas without even a coat, and in a low-cut, short-sleeved dress. They had no luggage, not even a toothbrush, and I'd say that it sounds as if it followed a hilarious session in the nightclubs only it so happens that Ted doesn't drink. Well, I hope they'll be happy!

I JUST hated to print the news about the Dale Robertson separation. I'd kept hearing the news that they were battling, but like Frankie and Ava, I hoped it would blow over. What makes it particularly sad in this case is that there is a three-month-old baby involved.

I like Dale very much but I am sure he is a difficult boy to live with. He's extremely moody. He seems to have some kind of a vague chip on his shoulder. He has a pose that he merely acts for the money in it, but I don't believe anything of the sort. He wouldn't be as good an actor as he always proves himself to be, if that were true.

So far, they are calling it a "trial separation". I hope they soon replace that for a permanent get-together.

WE don't get much rain in Hollywood, but believe me, socially we do get showers—and this month the most original one was given by Spike Jones—for two expectant fathers, Michael Wilding, Mr. Elizabeth Taylor to you, and Geary Steffan, Mr. Jane Powell to me.

My friend Spike, who is incapable of doing anything that isn't hilarious, served liquid refreshments in nursing bottles. All the guests had gone through the throes of fatherhood, including Fernando Lamas, Stewart Granger, Joseph Cotten, Gene Nelson, Ricardo Montalban, and Tony Martin, who sang lullabies that it is wiser not to print. The wives, meanwhile, went to a movie, which I call downright sensible of them.

Is the marriage of Ava Gardner and Frank Sinatra headed for the rocks? No one knows, but as I write this, the future looks black indeed.

Ava has tried very hard to hold this marriage together, but their fights have been increasing, both in number and in bitterness. Recently Frankie went to their Palm Springs home, and Ava followed him there. Another fight started when Frankie ordered her to take her clothes and get out and leave him alone, and when she didn't do it, he called for the police.

This isn't like Frankie, and no one can understand what is making him behave in such a way. Whether he is hurt that his own career hasn't kept pace with Ava's, I wouldn't know; but I am very sorry to see these things happen because Frankie really is a likable boy.

I do wish that such an intelligent, well brought up girl as Anne Baxter would stop giving out her recent silly statements and committing goofy acts. I can't believe that parting company with 20th Century-Fox after 11 mutually happy years can be really upsetting Anne's values—but something surely is.

First, Anne goes about asking, "Where can I get intelligent conversation in this town?" Then she takes up smoking cigars. She turned herself into a blonde which on her was no more becoming than it was on Ava Gardner, but John Hodiak quickly nixed that.

I'd like to say to Anne that in all my years of experience in Hollywood I've never known any personality to win by deliberately trying to tack a "new" tag on herself. The "new" Veronica Lake, with two eyes and practically no hair, for instance, was soon a forgotten Veronica Lake. When a girl actually evolves into another facet of personality, as Ava has, or Janie Wyman, or Joan Crawford, that's something else again and very stimulating. But this comes from the inside out, and has nothing to do with smoking cigars, believe you me.

THINKING OUT LOUDS . . . I expect Lana Turner's current romantic crush on Louis Salano, the handsome Mexican bullfighter, to last just about as long as it takes to get this in print. . . . It must be hard on a beautiful-but-lonely girl like Ursula Thiess to read the stories about Robert Taylor holding hands with Barbara Stanwyck in nightclubs, even though Bob says, and I believe, it was purely platonic. . . . I think the cutest gift of the month was Gordon MacRae's to his wife, Sheila. Sheila is always late, so Gordon gave her a magnificent watch, on the back of which he'd had engraved, "Now, maybe?" . . . The nicest pair, as far as being grateful to their public is concerned, are Tony Curtis and Janet Leigh—they'll do anything for their fans, which is not only kind of them but plenty smart. . . . I don't know why that dating of Debbie Reynolds and Bob Wagner doesn't ring true to me but it doesn't. . . . It's provable, however, that Peggy Ann Garner has grown up into a raving, tearing beauty with much lure, as witness Arthur Loew, Jr., Pat Neary (Mona Freeman's ex) and numerous others who keep her telephone constantly busy. . . . If I hear tomorrow that Marilyn Monroe and Joe DiMaggio have been married for some

"A horse remodeled our home!"

"There isn't a more generous husband on earth than Michael O'Shea," Virginia Mayo explains. "But he gave more than he realized when he presented me with my first horse. Now we practically make our home in the stables!"

"It's fun — but hard work. Grooming — cleaning saddles and bridles — is harder on my hands than a complete housecleaning. But Jergens Lotion soon softens them again."

"Keeping the stables spic and span is my job, too. That's another reason I'm so grateful for Jergens Lotion — it soothes my hands so fast. Try this and see why: Smooth one hand with quickly absorbed Jergens . . .

"Apply any ordinary lotion or cream to the other. Then wet them. Water won't 'bead' on the hand smoothed with Jergens as it will with oily cares."

"Come evening, my hands are smooth for close-ups with Mike." No wonder Jergens is used by more women than any other hand care in the world!

Jergens Lotion is effective — it doesn't just coat the skin. Jergens penetrates the upper layer and gives it softening moisture. 10¢ to $1, plus tax.

Remember JERGENS LOTION . . . because you care for your hands!

time I won't be surprised enough to lift even one eyebrow. . . . I'm getting bored with Steve Cochran's always losing his parrot, and I think Gary Merrill has reached the utter end in his "distinctive" dressing, which in his case means the beachcomber act of non-shaving, non-pressing and usually no shoes. . . . If I were Betty Grable, I'd worry over Debra Paget being such a musical comedy cutie in Stars And Stripes Forever and I'd throw a horse blanket over her, and then over Marilyn Monroe in Gentlemen Prefer Blondes and sprint toward a hit.

THE LETTER BOX: To Barbara Frisina of Burbank, California: I'd be delighted to write about Gloria Swanson whenever there is any news of her. Unfortunately there isn't at the moment, either in her career or her personal life. If I write more about Lana Turner and Liz Taylor it is because both these beauties manage to be continually exciting and provocative.

To Masao Manabe of Osaka, Japan: I'm delighted to get a letter from a fan in your country. The address for Joan Evans' fan club is c/o Miss Joan Pitts, president, 308 Mason Street, Newark, New York. John Derek's fan club is c/o Lyle Burroughs, president, 823 So. Catalina, Los Angeles, California.

To Sharry Simerl of Urbana, Illinois: I certainly agree with you that Gloria Grahame and Charlton Heston are very talented. I saw Gloria the other night, incidentally, in The Bad And The Beautiful and thought she just about stole the picture. As for Carlton, I hear that when this year's Paramount films, now planned for him, are released he will really hit the top.

PFC George Perkins, 45th Inf. Division, overseas: What a nice boy you are, judging by your letter. Write Jean Peters in care of 20th Century-Fox, Beverly Hills, California. Maybe your first letter went astray. And write the editor of MODERN SCREEN, if you want him to run more stuff on Jean. I'm sure you have more influence with him than I have because all of us want to give young patriots like you everything we possibly can.

Cpl. Mel Kampmann, somewhere in Korea: I'm glad to pass along the word to the other boys in service, as you request, to let them know that Doris Day does really answer her fan mail and photographic requests. Hurrah for Doris, and hurrah for you, too.

To Don Cooper and your two pals! I can see that you gentlemen prefer Ava Gardner blonde or otherwise, and I must say I don't blame you. And if you promise not to tell on me, I'll confess that I prefer comedies, too.

To Mary Burton, Franklinville, New York: Mary, are you sure that maybe you're not just a little jealous of Marilyn Monroe? I'll admit that sometimes Marilyn does err a little as regards conservative good taste—but I can't regard that as a major crime, particularly when weighed against Marilyn's personal warmth and generosity.

Joann Collins, Fredonia, New York: Joann, I hate to tell you you are not alone in climbing on the Tab Hunter bandwagon. In all my years, I've seldom seen any boy zoom up faster than this young chap after one single picture. Tab is six-foot-one, blond, with hazel eyes, and he is not only unmarried but heart whole and fancy free.

Well, that's all for now. See you next month.

ODDS BODKINS:

Everybody has given up on Ava and Frankie Sinatra. Whether they'll stay together or not is the big question, of course—but how CAN they when she is spending 18 months in Europe. She will make three pictures over there, the first being Mogambo with Clark Gable. . . . Did you know that before Ava accepted that flashy role opposite Gregory Peck in Snows Of Kilimanjaro it was turned down by Hedy Lamarr? . . . And that Susan Hayward wouldn't have played the part of the other woman opposite Peck if she had known Ava would be in the picture? It's the truth, and 20th accomplished it by shooting Ava's sequences after they had Susie's in the can! . . . The one gal I see at EVERY Hollywood party: Jeanne Crain. . . . This makes Ty Power sound a trifle on the conceited side but it's a fact nonetheless: he and his Linda tossed a party to unveil some murals painted by Karin and Ernst van Leyden depicting the life of Ty! . . . Betty Hutton got a lot of attention from the British press because of the gigantic pearl-and-emerald choker she wore upon her arrival there. But when she told reporters it was fake, they accused her of bad taste.

WHO'S MAD AT WHOM:

It sounds like something right out of an old-fashioned melodrama but I'm convinced Dale and Jackie Robertson wouldn't have had THEIR bust-up if Jackie had borne Dale a son instead of a daughter! He had his heart set on a son—in fact, he'd had the nursery painted blue. . . . Outside of kidding about who gets custody of the Robertsons' police dog (Dale's very attached to his pet!), everybody in Hollywood was doing the raised eyebrows routine over the way Dale went crying to John Carroll. As a matter of fact, he stayed with John for a few days. . . . All of which was merely a repetition of what happened when Mario Lanza left his Betty. Mario stayed with John too. . . . And the bitter punchline to the whole story is that John is in no position to give advice to EITHER Dale or Mario, since his own marriage to MGM talent coach Lucille Ryman is another one of those on-again-off-again things!

A big studio executive is responsible for the broken engagement of Mitzi Gaynor and Dick Coyle. . . . Shelley Winters will be mighty mad at Sir Stork if he arrives before her husband gets back from Rome. . . . It happened at the "Out Of This World" baseball game. Harry James, Betty Grable's present spouse, had some kind of an argument with Jackie Coogan, Betty's ex-spouse, and yelled, "Look, Coogan, if you're not careful I'll give you back your old lady!" . . . Peggy Rutledge, Liz Taylor's secretary, and the butler Mike Wilding brought from London didn't get along. So at press time it looked like Mike would have to let the butler go. . . . Walter Wanger couldn't attend the Los Angeles opening of Joan Bennett's play, Bell, Book And Candle, but another of Joan's ex-husbands—Gene Markey—showed up!

from his Korean Army duty with two ribbons and a battle star. Remember when Eddie used to date Marilyn Morrison, who married Johnnie Ray while Eddie was away? . . . Doris Day acted as stand-in for her stand-in! The gal, one of Doris' best friends, is expecting a baby. . . . Mala Powers, who has been very ill, is expected back before the cameras and completely recovered by the time you read this.

Despite parental objections, Carol Lee Ladd and Bill Evans, son of the Rev. Louis Evans (Bill's brother Lou married Colleen Townsend) are planning on getting married. Sue Ladd fears that Bill's ministerial background and Carol Lee's show business background are definitely NOT hand-in-glove. And Sue'll be sore at me for saying this but it's gospel! . . . Alan, by the way, was prostrated for three days in England by the news that Jezebel, his favorite dog, had died of poisoning. . . . Ursula Thiess went to Ciro's by her lonesome one Wednesday night and sat in the same booth occupied the previous night by the once-married Barbara Stanwyck and Bob Taylor. 'Twas Bob's first night away from Ursula, his new amour. . . . Idle thought: Debbie Reynolds talks too much in movie houses. . . . And somebody should tell Debra Paget that 9:30 A.M. is MUCH too early to go strolling in Beverly Hills in a taffeta cocktail dress cut down to HERE, a mink stole—and bare-foot!

QUICK QUOTES:

Jimmy Stewart walked up to Ray Milland after a screening of The Thief and said, "Ray, if I could only act like you!" . . . I told Shirley Booth she deserves an Oscar for her acting in Come Back, Little Sheba. She replied, "It was such a pleasant experience working in California, it would only seem like gilding the lily to have an Oscar for it" . . . Olivia deHavilland asked Cobina Wright how she thought Olivia's starring role in My Cousin Rachel ought to be played. Cobina replied, "Play it like the kind of woman we all know, dearest Olivia—the kind who can attend the same party with her lover without another soul there knowing that they ARE lovers!" . . . Rock Hudson writes from England, where he's reported feuding with his Toilers Of The Sea co-star, Yvonne De Carlo: "As yet I haven't found a girl who is attractive enough to make me lose my head."

FUNNIES:

Eavesdropped in Schwab's: "I refuse to believe that dollar bills carry germs. A germ couldn't live on a dollar today!" . . . Scott Brady says he knows a tobacco outfit that wants to sponsor Bishop Fulton Sheen's television show and advertise a cigarette called Holy Smoke! . . . Oddest sight of the month: MacDonald Carey standing in horrified silence while the priest baptized his fourth child—using the wrong name! . . . David Selznick buries his head in a pillow and mumbles into it while interviewing secretarial applicants. The gal who hears him best gets the job. . . . James Wong Howe, the ace cameraman, was getting ready to shoot Tallulah Bankhead in her first movie in years, Main Street To Broadway. Tittered Tallulah, "Throw away that gauze you were going to shoot me through, James—the only way you can cover up MY wrinkles is by shooting me through linoleum!"

Stewart

Rocky Cooper went to the Marion Davies party for Johnnie and Marilyn Ray with Gary but almost wound up solo when Dusty Miller caught Coop's ear while he was en route to the washroom. . . . Chata Wayne staged to the same party with Patricia Vanderbilt, who the very next day sued Cornelius Vanderbilt for divorce. . . . Some sideline observers think that the thing that broke up Barbara Stanwyck and Ralph Meeker was the news leak that Ralph is only 29, compared to Babs' ??? . . . Before Rita Hayworth left for Paris she promised Aly Kahn she would try to guide her life, not his. Rita knew all along she could never control the latter. . . . Dorothy Arnold DiMaggio, Joe's ex-wife, had some photos taken by Tom Kelley, the photog who shot that famous calendar photo of Marilyn Monroe!

SEX APPEAL:

Jane Wyman displayed the prettiest legs in town at the Masquers Revels, a benefit for the Motion Picture Country Home and Hospital. Janie danced and sang the part of a burlesque cutie. . . . When will glamorous movie stars learn that glamorous movie stars don't sit at drugstore counters in Hollywood eating tuna fish sandwiches—and I'm not naming names! . . . Lex Barker is happier making Westerns than he is in the Tarzan pictures, because in the Westerns he doesn't have to shave his chest. . . . And leave it to Lex, Dale Robertson and Tab Hunter to cop all the beefcake honors posing in abbreviated swimsuits poolside at the opening of the new Sahara Hotel in Las Vegas.

Greer Garson on the always interesting subject of Marilyn Monroe: "Marilyn is a very smart girl. Of course, she doesn't like to wear clothes—but neither do I! The big difference, I guess, is that I like to conform" . . . A fan offered Virginia Mayo a new car. A press agent asked Virginia, "Would you take it from a stranger?" And Virginia answered, "Anybody who offers me a car automatically becomes an old friend!" . . . Groucho Marx asked his five-year-old Melinda, "What do you do at school?" And Melinda replied, "We paint and go to the little girls' room."

LONG HUNCH DEP'T:

Hollywood's topmost glamor gals have been put on the defensive—and will continue that way, believe me!—by Marilyn Monroe, the likes of whose publicity hasn't been seen in this town for many a year. Among those who are going all-out for sexy publicity buildups, as a result, and de-emphasizing their home ties are Greer Garson, Jeanne Crain, Anne Baxter, Sally Forrest, and Vanessa Brown. . . . Why, do you know the first gal Tallulah Bankhead, an old pal of mine, asked to meet when she arrived here from the East? Marilyn! . . . Vera-Ellen knit a sweater for Dean Miller but this is one romance that'll never knit! In fact, I have a feeling Vera will never wed as long as her mother is with her.

Wyman

In preparation for her marriage to Dick Egan, watch for Ann Sothern to embrace the Catholic faith. Her daughter Patricia has also been taking instructions. . . . Janet Leigh has been studying Christian Science. . . . And a number of writers at Paramount have been attending services at Jane Russell's mother's chapel in the Valley. . . . Don't let anybody tell you it doesn't pay to be good in this town. Ann Blyth has held onto stardom without one hint of scandal. . . . John Agar, bound and determined he'll be a singer in addition to acting, is studying vocalizing. His first professional song stint was a duet on "Don't Fence Me In" for an airshow with Doris Day. . . . Mercedes McCambridge, who lost her baby, told me she has turned down one film role after another—"because my agents keep offering me scripts in which I would play 'Sadie Burke,' the same character in All The King's Men for which I won an Oscar. I don't want to play 'Sadie' any more, even under a different name! Aren't there ANY other parts, preferably sympathetic, that I could play?" Well, aren't there?

FINANCIAL PAGE:

Irene Dunne and Loretta Young are putting $250,000 into a new clubhouse and other improvements for their jointly owned Ojai Valley Inn. . . . Dennis Day uses his own name, Dennis McNulty, when making business deals outside his own singing and acting profession. He says it prevents his being bilked by salespeople and others who always hike the prices when they know they're dealing with a movie star. . . . Louis Hayward has gone into millinery as a sideline. He's now a partner of Kenneth Hopkins, the hat designer. . . . John Wayne paid Chata $1,000 a month pending the divorce, which makes her claim that she has to do her own housework seem rather silly. . . . Incidentally, Wayne paid his first wife, Josephine, the princely sum of $60,000 alimony last year.

While making a personal appearance in connection with the opening of The Lusty Men in Oklahoma City, Marilyn Maxwell opened the Gideon Bible in her hotel room and found four $20-bills. This sounds like a press agent gag but it's true, Marilyn swears! . . . Tab Hunter, who got $250 a week (before taxes) from David Rose for co-starring with Linda Darnell in Island Of Desire, is now dragging down $1,300 a week for new picture assignments. . . . Randy Scott gets $10,000 a week when he works on his two-pictures-a-year contract for Warners. . . . Zsa Zsa Gabor enrolled her daughter, Francesca Hilton, in Mrs. James Mason's nursery school—but Zsa Zsa and Mrs. Mason, as you probably know, are not exactly devoted to each other! . . . Ginger Rogers was lurking in the shadows of the Los Angeles airport when Jacques Bergerac arrived here from Paris. Peter Shaw, Ginger's agent, met Jacques as he got off the plane and brought him to Ginger's royal presence. . . . Dick Powell and June Allyson bought 58 acres, including a lake, in Mandeville Canyon.

COME BACK, LITTLE SHEBA

Midway in her performance as Lola Delaney, slovenly, prattling wife of an aging chiropractor, Shirley Booth trudges out on the front porch of the decayed Victorian house in which they live and calls plaintively, as is her habit, for her missing dog Sheba. The symbolism of the title thus becomes apparent; it mirrors the picture's tragic theme. This is the story of everyone who evokes the nostalgic past and all that it might have offered; who refuses to face and accept an unpleasant present and all that the future may bring. Specifically it is the story of "Doc" Delaney, a onetime medical student who is a failure, and of Lola, who is a failure as his wife. A reformed drunkard and a member of Alcoholics Anonymous, "Doc" married her years before out of sheer necessity; this forced him to give up his schooling, and under his well-bred restraint he has never forgiven or forgotten. Nor can Lola forget she was once the most popular girl at the prom. Her dreams of a lifetime romance having faded, she has taken refuge in memories as "Doc" once took refuge in drink. Then, suddenly, the Delaneys are shocked out of their longtime compromise with their fate. They take in a college girl as boarder, and she appears to be making all their own mistakes. "Fast" but healthily modern in a sense foreign to the cloistered older couple, she is able to take care of herself. "Doc," however, mistakes her actions and her motives, and turmoil comes to the Delaney household again. The ending is different from the stage play's, and so is the emphasis, but both versions are equally believable. Burt Lancaster may be too young for the part of "Doc," but he manages to bluff it out without the benefit of inordinate make-up. The girl and her boy friend are honestly played by Terry Moore and Richard Jaeckel; Daniel Mann's direction is, if anything, even more tellingly detailed than it was in the original. But it is William Inge's script and Shirley Booth's playing of it that matter most, and both seem to benefit by the increased importance of her part, for Lola, indeed, is the crux of the whole problem. Come Back, Little Sheba, like its subject, is painfully real. No light night's entertainment, it offers what in the long run is likely to prove far more satisfactory: a moving, brooding view of one of man's basic predicaments and in Miss Booth's performance a portrait that few will ever forget.—Paramount

BECAUSE OF YOU

An old-fashioned tear-jerker, slickly scripted and slickly played, Because Of You is about an innocent young dance-hall girl who goes to the big house because her boy friend dealt in dope. He never got around to telling her, it seems, what the white stuff was used for. Prison clears her mind, educates her and sends her on a high mission as a nurse. In a hospital she meets a wealthy but unhealthy airman (Jeff Chandler), so tenuously adjusted to the world that he can't be told about her prison past. With a stiff upper lip she keeps her silence and marries him. They have a baby daughter. And then her former fiancé comes back to haunt her and the truth comes out. Her husband has the marriage annulled and takes custody of the little girl. Years pass, and she can stand the separation no longer. Masquerading as "Miss Marvel, the Magic Lady," she takes a job as governess in her husband's home while he is abroad. It's a lucky thing, too, for her child is showing alarming symptoms of lack of mother love. Naturally, the inevitable confrontation scene occurs when the father unexpectedly returns. This sort of thing used to be called a woman's picture. There appears to be no reason in this emancipated age why any woman would accept its illogical premises and falsely emotional plot any more readily than would a man.

Cast: Loretta Young, Jeff Chandler, Alex Nicol.—Universal.

WAY OF A GAUCHO

Made entirely in Argentina, this film about the gauchos, or cowboys, of the last century captures the full flavor of the colorful pampas country, the Argentinian plains. More particularly, it catches the untamed spirit of the hard-riding horsemen whose lean herds of cattle made the unfenced stretches of green pampas grass their free domain. As Martin, gaucho among gauchos, Rory Calhoun personifies these people—proud, passionate, recognizing no law but their own. Martin kills a man who has insulted his patron. By gaucho custom, this is a fair fight and an honorable one, but under new laws formulated by city folk he is arrested and sentenced to service with the militia. This fans his resentment against the remorseless march of civilization that means roads and railways, cultivation and fences and an end to the gaucho's ways. Bred in the undisciplined democracy of the pampas lands, Martin finds Army rules and regulations more than he can take. He deserts and wins leadership of other outlaws who have taken refuge in the hills behind the plains. Behind him he leaves Teresa (Gene Tierney), a wealthy young woman whom he once saved from Indian raiders and whom he has learned, in spite of the difference in their backgrounds, to love deeply. The rest of the film tells a double story, of the gaucho's fight with the authorities and of Martin's desperate attempts to make Teresa his wife. The separate strands of narrative are tied effectively to the scenario's main theme: the age-old struggle of the past against giving way to the present. And although one's sympathy is directed to Martin and his kind, even they recognize that the battle is a hopeless one. This gives the story of high adventure a tragic overtone that makes it more than just an historical "Western," south-of-the-equator style.

Cast: Rory Calhoun, Gene Tierney, Richard Boone, Hugh Marlowe.—20th Century-Fox.

THE PRISONER OF ZENDA

In the critical terms of the trade, the question, "How was the production?" is likely to mean how much did it cost and how was the money spent. In this case the answer is very much and very well. For the story of The Prisoner Of Zenda is a pretty timeworn tale, and it's a wonder anyone thought of remaking it. It's a greater wonder that they remade it so successfully. Fast-moving and full of Technicolor fantasies, it feasts the eye with fabulous swordplay and the ear with verbal riposte, so that a story so essentially old-fashioned suddenly doesn't seem quite so silly any more. The Prisoner Of Zenda is about the visit of a late 19th century Englishman (Stewart Granger) to one of those mythical middle European nations, just before a new king is crowned; how the king-to-be (Granger again) is incapacitated at the last moment and the proper Britisher, who happens to be his double, is persuaded to take over for the coronation ceremony. Naturally the hero falls headlong into a romance with his look-alike fiancée (Deborah Kerr) and there is as much heart-bleeding as blood-letting in the film thereafter. Not unexpectedly, there are a number of villains on the scene; the worst of these (James Mason) has the gift of charming blather, and in his relaxedly wormwood mood he is allowed to comment on the action and set an arched-eyebrow pace for the production. The Prisoner Of Zenda is not to be taken too seriously, but not to be entirely discounted either. For everyone concerned it's something of a lark.

Cast: Stewart Granger, Deborah Kerr, James Mason, Robert Douglas, Jane Greer.—MGM.

PLYMOUTH ADVENTURE

Plymouth Adventure concerns the first little band of settlers who crossed the Atlantic on the Mayflower seeking freedom to work, think and pray in their own individual fashion. From any point of view a film like this is an enormous undertaking. It is basic history, deeply rooted in the American mind and emotion. These, after all, were the "founding fathers." It is also an epic tale of heroism and hardship so complex in what led up to it and so complicated in what came out of it that perhaps the subject is too wide even for the length of an extended feature film. Wisely, therefore, the story has been held to the actual sea voyage. Some of the scenes of ocean storm are among the most vivid ever made, dramatic in their picturization of wind, wave and battered vessel, of starving, thirsty humans crowded like cattle below deck on a wooden ship. These mass effects make for moving moments, and these portions of the picture come alive. Less can be said for the love story that rears its ugly, all-too-expected head. Evidently feeling their picture needed a personal focus, the scriptwriters have created in skipper Christopher Jones a gaunt and guilt-ridden man who hates all passengers until his sight falls on Mrs. William Bradford, wife of a Puritan leader. Played by Spencer Tracy and Gene Tierney with all the dignity they can muster, these characters never are quite realized. And so, after all, the film as a whole lacks the focus that is supplied fitfully by the fine character performers (Leo Genn and Barry Jones, in particular) and forcibly, when the occasion arises, by storm and sea.

Cast: Spencer Tracy, Gene Tierney, Leo Genn, Van Johnson, Barry Jones.—MGM.

SPRINGFIELD RIFLE

A better-than-average melodrama about a man of action who is also a man of conscience, Springfield Rifle features Gary Cooper in the type of role you expect to see him in. It's a part that fits him like the green buckskin jacket he wears through much of the film, and he plays it with his usual moody sensitivity, and the scriptwriters have given him plenty to do. In this case it's a double job: setting up the U. S. Army's first counter-espionage outfit, and trying out the Springfield, first weapon in the esteem of the cavalryman and footsoldier for so long. The story is set in a Midwestern fort, held by the Union forces, in the middle of the Civil War. Cooper is Major Lex Kearny, unit commander making a daring and final try to bring a much-needed column of horses and pack mules over snowbound and rocky country to the fort, so that the North can mount a spring offensive. Everybody knows that spies are forewarning Southern sympathizers of such trips, but when Kearny spots a raiding crew, figures himself outnumbered and tries to escape with his men unscathed, he is cashiered from the Army for his pains. The rest of the movie tells of his efforts to rehabilitate his fortunes with his country and his wife (Phyllis Thaxter), who doesn't understand because she can't be told. The way the scriptwriters manage it, it's pretty exciting stuff, with Kearny becoming a secret agent so he can discover who the spies really are. In this average-length movie, he has time to find out, for there are none of the fancy furbelows of side-plots that mar and interrupt so many otherwise intelligent melodramas. And perhaps because there are no side-plots to dissipate interest, Springfield Rifle holds that interest to the end.

Cast: Gary Cooper, Phyllis Thaxter, Paul Kelly, Philip Carey.—Warners.

THE IRON MISTRESS

The "iron mistress" of the title turns out to be nothing more than a Bowie knife. But if some may be misled by the variety of excitement the movie has to offer, excitement it provides a-plenty. For this is the violent history of James Bowie (Alan Ladd), the knife's inventor. The year is 1825. Young Bowie, a backwoodsman from the Louisiana bayou country, wins a hard-fought fight with his two brothers by a well-aimed blow with a blade. This is just fraternal roughhouse, it becomes clear, with the prize a much sought-for trip to New Orleans to sell some lumber from the family saw-mill. When Bowie gets to the city his knife-work takes on a far more serious complexion. His business duties fade before the vision of a hard-bitten beauty named Judalon (Virginia Mayo), and he fights a duel over her—first in a long and complicated series of fights and feuds he is due to engage in. Judalon is the direct or indirect cause of them all, and she turns out not to be worth all the trouble. This is the stuff that spectacles are made of—a romantic mixture of fact and fiction, full of the clash of steel on glinting steel, of colorful Creole costumes, fraught with death, flight and destruction. It is not, however, the stuff that acting feeds on. Ladd & Co. are kept so busy dashing about the rapidly changing scenery that they have little time to act as more than puppets. There's hardly a dull moment and hardly a logical, believable one.

Cast: Alan Ladd, Virginia Mayo, Douglas Dick, Alf Kjellin, Phyllis Kirk.—Warners.

THE STOOGES

If The Stooge is seldom as hilarious as the funnier portions of some past Martin-Lewis pictures, taken as a whole it is a far more enjoyable film. Slapstick humor can be pretty stultifying, once all the practical variations of pratfalls are played. The Stooge has more to offer: an endearing characterization. In this case Jerry Lewis, whose comic ability has long been obvious and sometimes too evident, has been persuaded to tone his performance down so that all can see there is a human side to the talented young man. The little demon has turned into an artful and often touching urchin—an ungainly, not too intelligent but not unattractive boy with a very good heart and an unholy ability to get himself into impossible situations. The situation in this case consists of acting as a stooge to a performer (effectively played by Dean Martin) whose ego is larger than his job as singer in oldtime vaudeville houses. Naturally, Jerry takes over the act. Although allowed no billing and paid but a pittance, he makes it a smashing success. The plot pits the self-conscious pride of the sophisticated song-and-dance man against the innate modesty of his simple second man. Bumbling and fumbling through his adolescence on "the road," Jerry becomes a man (he meets a girl named Frecklehead) and, admiring Martin's kind and beautiful wife (Polly Bergen), tries to make a man of his partner. The Stooge holds hope that Lewis may yet develop into a topnotch comic actor.

Cast: Jerry Lewis, Dean Martin, Polly Bergen, Marion Marshall—Paramount.

THE STEEL TRAP

The only question ament The Steel Trap is the one about why nobody ever made a picture on the subject before. Make no mistake about it, this is a beautifully conceived and executed suspense film; in fact, a natural. There is a lot of virtue—and a lot of suspense—in sheer simplicity. The trap of the title is a big bank vault. Joseph Cotten, as a junior executive at the Los Angeles City Bank, has worked in and around it for 11 years. And yet it is all in one moment that temptation comes and makes him forget everything that has seemed important to him before: his standing as an up-and-coming businessman in the community, as a husband to his lovely wife (Teresa Wright) and as a proud father. He sees his chance, and he takes it; he begins to make plans to steal $1,000,000. First Cotten has to decide how to get away with the loot; he learns there are no extradition agreements between the U. S. and Brazil. Then there is the problem of passports; visas are hurried for no man. This leads to the first of a thousand frightening delays. But by now he has the money; it is a week-end, and the embezzlement won't be discovered until the bank re-opens on Monday. As the hours pass and Saturday slips into Sunday, the suspense grows greater, gradually reaching such steel-tautness as to be almost unbearable. Will the absconding banker get away with his crime and if he does will he ever sleep soundly again? Cotten and Miss Wright make the couple they play as real as the couple next door. This is a portrait of a man on the lam, not a picture about how he got that way. But within its smaller sphere it carries the agony of real pity, captured in the man's loneliness, the wife's despair, the shocked suspicion of outsiders.

Cast: Joseph Cotten, Teresa Wright.—20th Century-Fox.

they're not . . .

too young for marriage

BY RICHARD DEXTER

A week before their separation, Dale and Jackie attended the gala Hotel Sahara opening in Las Vegas. No one noticed anything wrong between them. The suddenness of the split came as a surprise to most of the movie industry.

■ Suddenly one day, after a little more than a year of marriage, and three months after the birth of his baby daughter, Rochelle, Dale Robertson got up from his favorite chair in his Reseda home and calmly announced to his wife, Jackie, that he had come to the conclusion their marriage had been a mistake. Then he slipped on a jacket and walked out of the house.

This report is being written a week after that happened, and this writer has just finished talking to Mrs. Robertson on the telephone. Right now, tonight, Dale is back home—and the daily newspapers tomorrow will carry the stories of the reconciliation. But it really isn't a reconciliation, because this is the way my conversation with Mrs. Robertson ended:

"Then Dale is back home," I said.

"Temporarily," said Jackie Robertson.

"What does that mean?" I asked.

"Well," she said, "Dale is home now and we are trying to talk things out."

"Then may I tell the readers of MODERN SCREEN that you are back together again temporarily?"

"Yes, you can," said Jackie. "That's the way it is right now—and neither one of us knows if it will be any more than that later."

This was pretty honest talk for Hollywood, very unusual, indeed. Although she has been reported to be seriously broken up by the separation, Jackie Robertson is facing the facts and will not kid herself or anyone else. She is by no means casual about the matter, either. She feels deeply that somewhere she or her husband failed, and she will not make light of the situation by denying that it is a tragedy, nor will she cover her sorrow with a masquerade of lies.

According to their friends, the people who have known (Continued on page 21)

them longest in Hollywood, the handwriting has been on the wall for sometime. The decision to separate was no sudden whim. Although there have never been any violent quarrels in the family, there has been, for a long time, a coolness that their friends felt could only result in the smash of the marriage.

However, no marriage, particularly one between two such young and earnest people, should be written off as a simple mistake. There must always be reasons why, small reasons maybe, but reasons that when piled together make a huge smothering complaint. We decided to talk to their friends and try to find out just what did happen; what came before the casual walk-out.

No person who knows them can deny that Dale Robertson was sure he was in love when he married Jackie. And her closest girl chums will tell you that Jackie was ecstatically happy on her wedding day—and believed with all her heart that she would remain Mrs. Dale Robertson for the rest of her days. It was a fine wedding, with about 50 guests present. It was held at the home of Jackie's parents, high in the Hollywood hills overlooking the city. Everyone was very pleased about the match, particularly Jackie's parents, who were proud that their daughter had snagged such a handsome, successful young man. No, despite the fact that it was a sudden marriage—and that Dale proposed the first night he dated Jackie, there was no reason to hope for anything but the best on the day that Jackie and Dale got married.

One of the first things a person must look for in inspecting the remains of a broken marriage is for evidences of diversified interests. Well, in the case of Dale and Jackie, their major interest is horses—and it is a passion with both of them. And

One late afternoon during World War II I was making a hurried trip to town in a not-too-clean one-and-a-half ton "G.I." truck from Walla Walla Army Air Base where I was a chauffeur. Riding with me was a sergeant who was in charge of the supplies I was to pick up in town.

As we were leaving the base, we saw a corporal standing waiting for a bus to town.

"Shall we give him a ride?" I asked.

"It's O.K. with me, but he rides in the back!" growled the sarge.

We pulled up and I yelled, "Want a ride, corporal?" The soldier grinned and climbed nimbly into the back where he had to stand during the noisy windy ride to town. Once there he jumped out, said, "Thanks a lot," and gave me what is now a very famous smile.

I have often wondered what Alan Ladd thought of that wild ride.

Mrs. Elaine Denton
Everett, Washington

it was not something one taught the other. Jackie was a fine horsewoman long before she ever met Dale, and would rather spend the day in a riding ring than anywhere else in the world.

Another thing to look for is another man—or another woman. There is neither in this case. Dale frankly admits he is a flirt, that he likes to wink at the "fillies," but, as one woman he knows puts it: "He's a million miles away from you after that wink. I don't think he could ever concentrate on another woman long enough to get himself in trouble." In the case of Jackie, she has been too busy starting a home and having a baby to even look at another man. No, there is no triangle.

THE trouble, then, must lie deeper and we think that the entire matter can be summed up in what Dale is reported to have said to Jackie when he left. "I'm not ready for marriage and raising a family yet," he is said to have told her just before he left the house. And he is probably right.

One close friend of the Robertsons freely suggests that the fact that their baby turned out to be a girl had something to do with it. This, of course, is nonsense, but it can not be denied that the fact the child wasn't a boy did have an effect on Dale's happiness. He was so sure his wife was going to give him a son that he bought the kid a wardrobe long before the date of the blessed event. A real western wardrobe, which he could wear when he was a couple of years old. And to cinch the fact that this just wasn't a gag, he even bought a pony. Dale loves his daughter, but he is no doubt still bearing the scars of disappointment at not having been presented with a son.

Another friend suggested that Dale was beginning to believe the publicity he read about himself in the papers. Well, he would hardly be human if he didn't get a bit of a swelled head from what he reads about himself. In little more than a year he has zoomed from practically anonymity to stardom—and has become the number-one boy in the fan mail sweepstakes at his studio. And the critics have been kind to him, calling him such nice things as another Gable. It would have to be a pretty stodgy type of guy that wouldn't change just a little bit after that, particularly, as Dale did, if a man had spent several years bucking adversity to reach his goal.

We have heard it said often that he had gone high hat—no longer talked to people on the lot who were once his pals. Well, they say that about every new star at one time or another. The point to remember is that when he was a nobody no one would have noticed if he hadn't spoken or returned a greeting. They do when a man becomes a star—and the root of most accusations of this sort generally is in the accuser's mind.

We would say, after a careful analysis of the matter, that the reasons for the separation lie somewhere in the middle of these facts and suppositions. There is some truth in all of the charges, but in no one of them enough power to break up a marriage. And there are other things.

For instance, outside interests. For more than a year Dale has had a baseball club, composed of friends at the studio and in his neighborhood. The team plays on a diamond in the San Fernando Valley at least three times a week, at night. For the first few months after they were married Jackie attended all the games. But later on, as the weather grew cooler, she began to stay home once in a while. Then, after she became pregnant, she stopped going altogether. Well, that meant that Dale was out three nights a week playing ball—and possibly another night or two on business or at one of his other hobbies, like horses. Jackie, then, was home a good deal alone—and any woman, no matter how valid her husband's reason, gets a little sick of that. Another contributing cause, we believe, is the fact that Dale is so crazy about golf that whenever he is not working, he will spend every day chasing a little white ball around a course.

Now let's look at some of Jackie's problems. The most important thing is that she has a complex about Dale not liking her cooking. When she was married, like so many other brides, she knew absolutely nothing about cooking. She couldn't even make coffee. But she wanted to run her own kitchen, so she decided to learn. Well, a tough testing ground is a husband's stomach—and it may be that Dale didn't feel he deserved this and consequently he ate home as little as he could. One of Jackie's friends said that she would prepare a fancy dinner and Dale would nibble a bite or two and then push his plate away, claiming he was full. And Jackie is reported to have stormed once that she didn't think he was sneaking off with another woman—but she did think he was sneaking his meals someplace, because a big guy like him had to eat more than Dale did to stay alive.

Another friend of Jackie told us that she thought Jackie was too young for a successful marriage. True, she was only 19, but many, many girls marry at that age and it lasts a lifetime. But Jackie was a bit younger than her years. She had been indulged by her parents to the point that many people claimed she was spoiled. She had never had to get out and earn her own living. She modeled a little after getting out of school and worked in one picture at 20th Century-Fox. That was all. Maybe she was a little inexperienced for the job of coping with the butcher and baker and running a home.

Yes, the little things sometimes pile up and smash a marriage. For instance there was the time a few months ago that Jackie took Dale's favorite dog, a German shepherd named Blaze, to the golf club across from the studio where Dale works. Somehow the animal got out of the car and was hit by a passing auto and killed. Dale was inconsolable for a long time—and they say he blamed Jackie for the pet's death.

This writer had a chance to observe Dale and his wife together for a few days in Las Vegas, Nevada, a week before they broke up. It was at the opening of the fabulous Sahara Hotel and everyone was having a gay time. At the time we didn't honestly pay much attention, never suspecting, of course, that anything was wrong. But now that we look back on it everyone seemed to be having a lot of fun but Dale and Jackie. Sure they sat together at dinner and went to the shows together, but something was lacking. As we look back they did not appear to be delighted with each other's company.

THERE is one place in a studio where all the gossip is known, and all the situations cooking on the lot are evaluated and conclusions, more often right than wrong, are reached. That place is the mail room. Here the studio messengers congregate and cover the entire studio many times a day making their rounds with letters and messages. We checked a good source in the 20th Century-Fox mail room for an opinion—a consensus on whether or not Dale and Jackie Robertson would work their problem out and continue with their marriage.

The consensus was that they would not.

This is a pretty inaccurate forecast, we hope, because it is an unhappy one. But we are inclined to go along with it. We have the feeling that Dale and Jackie right now just don't want to iron things out—or are not ready to face the fact that somebody is going to have to make some concessions—one or the other.

When we spoke to Jackie she didn't have a hopeful ring in her voice, not at all the kind of ring you'd expect to hear from a girl whose husband had just come home after a parting that looked like the end. She admitted that they were going to make a stab at it again, but she seemed to have little enthusiasm for it—maybe because she believes herself that it won't work.

Dale Robertson will be around a long time. He's got the movies by the tail—and he's hanging on. But he's not going to be a happy man for a long while if this current reconciliation doesn't take. Dale is the kind of fellow who calls women "Ma'm." He takes just about everything seriously, certainly something as big in a man's life as his marriage. Even if he doesn't really know what the matter is now, he will someday—and then it might be too late. END

BECAUSE YOU'RE MINE—Lee-Ah-Loo; You Do Something To Me, by Mario Lanza (Victor).

RCA Victor just signed the temperamental tenor to a new contract after a big fight about terms. If his latest shenanigans haven't cost him too many fans, these sides should do very nicely, though some of us still can't share the general enthusiasm for his vocal style.

BIG SKY—When I Dream by Bob Eberly* (Capitol).

EVERYTHING I HAVE IS YOURS—title song by Billy Eckstine* (MGM); Roger Coleman (Decca).

HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN—Anywhere I Wander by Fran Warren (MGM).

By the time you read this, MGM will have some new versions out of several songs from this picture, sung by Mr. & Mrs. Frank Loesser—he's the talented tunesmith who wrote the score.

JUMPING JACKS—I Know A Dream When I See One by Dean Martin* (Capitol).

HOLLYWOOD'S BEST—Rosemary Clooney & Harry James (Columbia).

Hollywood's Best is not the title of a movie. It's the name of a new LP record on which Rosemary Clooney sings, and Harry James and his orchestra play, eight evergreen songs that won the annual awards of the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences. An ideal gift.

The Continental (from The Gay Divorcee), 1934.

Sweet Leilani (from Waikiki Wedding), 1937.

Over The Rainbow (from The Wizard Of Oz), 1939.

When You Wish Upon A Star (from Pinocchio), 1940.

You'll Never Know (from Hello, Frisco, Hello), 1943.

It Might As Well Be Spring (from State Fair), 1945.

On The Atchison, Topeka & The Santa Fe (from The Harvey Girls), 1946.

In The Cool, Cool, Cool Of The Evening (from Here Comes The Groom), 1951.

Altogether, these songs make a delightful set and offer some of the best work ever waxed by Rosemary and Harry.

Apologies to the two Alans. Last month we credited Dean's Let's Call It A Day to Dale. Incidentally, Give Me Your Lips is from the new picture, April In Paris.

"Why don't I stop being so career-minded and go home and bake a cake, I keep asking myself," says Ann Blyth. Here's the ninth in MODERN SCREEN's new series on the art of living, written by Hollywood's top stars.

Take my word for it

by ANN BLYTH; star columnist for January

Why don't I get married—I ask myself.

People have more fun at small parties.

Kitchens should be warm and friendly.

24 I love rain—from inside, looking out!

GOING UP? I'm awfully glad that the custom of men tipping their hats when a lady enters an elevator is fading out. On a crowded elevator it was hard to keep from laughing—all the men seemed so awfully short-armed as they scrooched their heads down and were just about able to wiggle their forearms up.

I was rather surprised the other day to hear the traditional explanation of why a man takes to the outside when walking with a lady—something about the gutters being full of mud in the old days and the necessity of protecting her from getting splashed by horses galloping past. Piffle! From the time I was a little girl I had my own reason and I still like it better—the girl is on the inside because it is easier for her to see the store windows!

Suggested new custom for riding an escalator with a lady: the man should not stand on the upper step—it makes the girl feel so awfully little looking up to him. Let her have it and she can feel like a queen riding on a magic carpet—if only for a minute.

TIP TO HOLLYWOOD (and anyone else interested): Save the big parties for an extra special occasion. People have so much more fun in small groups. Actually, even at a big party, the guests work into small gatherings anyway. How many people can you really talk to at a time . . . and be actually warm with and gay? Not ten, I bet. They would have to be your ten oldest and closest friends . . . then certainly not 20, or 50! The bigger the party the less the intimacy; the less the intimacy the colder the party. (Besides—if you happen to know a funny story and tell it at a big affair there is sure to be someone else who has heard it before. At a small affair you at least have a fighting chance of putting it over!) Add constant interruptions as new guests arrive and further introductions have to be made—and whole batches of strangers find themselves looking at each other with baffled eyes!

Actress named Blyth overheard talking to herself: "Why don't you try for pictures in which you can sing more? Why don't you try for comedies—parts like the one you had with Robert Montgomery in Once More, My Darling? Why don't you see about doing a play again . . . and get that gratifying feeling of really being an actress when you walk out in front of a new audience every night? Why don't you get married? Why don't you . . . oh, why don't you stop being so career-minded and go home and bake a cake or take a long and languorous bath or set your hair or something?"

Which reminds me of baths and kitchens and things like that:

BATHS I LIKE, but showers I don't. Yet when I finally talk myself into taking a shower I feel wonderful afterwards. Of course, with a bath I not only feel wonderful afterward, I feel wonderful during. Kitchens—could it be possible for designers of kitchens and the things that belong to kitchens to make them look less like clinics? All that spotless white and chrome—you feel like you are about to operate rather than cook a meal. It's a wonder someone hasn't yet written a movie scene in a kitchen in which the cook calls out her orders like a surgeon: "Paring knife! Mixer! Spatula! Pot! . . ."

To me the kitchen is the foundation of the house. It should be a friendly, warm place, maybe in reds and browns, with wood and brick; a place where the kettle sings and there are chairs and a table and that's where you want to be . . . not where you go to "perform" with food.

When I got home from school as a child I used to go straight to the kitchen . . . to sit at the table for a snack . . . and chatter, chatter to mother about the day's adventures. (Which reminds me of the afternoon when I really had an adventure to tell her about—the traditional one. I was about seven and this man drove up in a shiny black car and asked me if I liked candy and said he would drive me to the store and get me some if I got in the car!) I can still see myself at the table, with a sandwich in one hand and a big glass of milk in the other, feeling so important as I told my mother all about this . . . !

I LEARNED TO COOK EARLY and still love to cook. But do today's kitchens pull at little girls like this . . . these scrupulously white chambers where you are disgraced if you happen to drop something, or, perish forbid, get a spot on anything?

There is a stage kitchen I will always remember . . . the one in the play, The Watch On The Rhine, in which I had the role of Babette during its Broadway run. I was 13 then, and love comes to marlon brando

■ Just a little more than a year ago, Marlon Brando was on his way from Hollywood to New York after completing his work in the 20th Century-Fox picture, Viva Zapata. Although a young man who dislikes encumbrances thoroughly, he had suddenly discovered he had two of them. One was an animal, a raccoon, which had been given to him by his mother. The other was a woman, a woman known by the single name of Movita, whom he had acquired in the usual manner: courtship.

Marlon doesn't like to face problems much, either, but he had to face one then. Should he leave the raccoon in the warm sunshine of California? Should he leave Movita in the warm sunshine of California? Or should he take one or both of them back to the frigid caverns of New York? He thought it over very carefully and made a decision. There were plenty of women in New York, but few raccoons, so he decided to leave Movita in her native state—and take the pet back home with him.

Well, he had a little difficulty on both counts. Actually, the raccoon didn't care much, although Movita did. She had been Marlon's only date for weeks and was in love with him—and she felt, as all good women do in such a circumstance, that she should be invited to go wherever he went. Love wasn't something to be balked by mileage. Marlon, after giving it some serious thought, didn't quite agree—and there was what is called in some circles a scene. In the matter of the raccoon, the railway people didn't see eye to eye with Marlon. They told him that it would be impossible for his animal to share a drawing room with him even if he did buy another (Continued on page 78)

Movita, whose real name is Mrs. Jack Doyle, met Marlon on location for Viva Zapata. She's been in pictures on and off since 1934, when she made Mutiny On The Bounty opposite Clark Gable.

PARIS—The game of love along the frothier byways of European society is a devious one. As far as its Parisian members are concerned, Rita Hayworth has had two chances to score in her marriage with Aly Khan and has fluffed both times—because she doesn't know the rules. This isn't Rita's version of what has happened, of course. From everything she has done, and the little she has said, it appears that the more she catches on to the rules the less she likes the game. The trouble is—and this is typical of Rita—she can leave Aly but she can't forget him. It's even more complicated than this. Aly is devoted to her—in his way.

At a dinner party one evening which he attended without her (perfectly routine behavior for the champagne set), he was teased about Rita by an attractive table partner. This girl pretended his gallantry was being overwhelming and she threatened to tell Rita about it. The round, calf-like eyes of Monsieur le Prince Aly Khan grew serious and he turned to her squarely. "Don't do that please, ever," he begged. "I couldn't bear to hurt anyone who has never been anything but sweet to me."

Aly meant it. And this is the enigma of Rita's marriage to him. Aly is by nature a kind man. He is generous, so generous to others as well as to himself that he is occasionally strapped for cash—as Rita has reportedly (and repeatedly) complained. He is a wonderful host and has a widespread friendship for which his (Continued on page 82)

Bob and Chris watch TV in their favorite get-ups—Levis and checked hunting shirts.

■ One evening last August an odd looking contraption rolled into a small Idaho mountain town and parked in a puff of dust near a small all-nite café. Outside, the strange heap resembled a sawed off Quonset-hut mounted on a Ford truck. Inside was crammed a stove, icebox, collapsible canvas boat and outboard motor, six fishing outfits, a rifle, an arbolette spear, four sleeping bags, four mattresses, two built-in beds and a cot on which a couple of tow-heads, nine and eleven, named Chris and Jim, were deep in dreamland.

From the cab descended a pair of huskies in wool shirts and Levis, dog-tired, grimed with rock dust, and damp with salmon stream water. They shook loose the kinks from their long legs and strolled inside the café for coffee. They'd hardly dumped in the sugar when a shrill gust of feminine screams and the clatter of high heels swept up like a minor tornado outside.

The bigger sportsman, Bob Mitchum, swivelled his rocky profile around, hep right away to the furor. "Oh, oh," he grunted to his pal, Tim Wallace. "Lose this!" They jumped off their stools and shot out the door, started down the street. But it was too late. A dozen girls had them boxed in. They chased Bob down the sidewalk, tackled his churning knees. One clamped on his neck and screamed, (Continued on page 76)

"Let's go!" is the Mitchum war-cry. Here, Bob, Chris and Jimmy load up for a hunting trip. They're bedding down the "Oochapap," Bob's trailer.

It's not family-life that makes Bob restless—he loves to take them along. Here, with Chris, Dorothy, Petrina (eight months old) and Jimmy, at home.

Bob helped build the "Oochapap" (a Cajun word for practically anything) on the RKO lot when production was dull. It cost him plenty, but, as a symbol of freedom, was worth it to Bob. He keeps it ready to roll.

The Mitchum men return from a successful deer-hunt. When they're not off in the wilds, Bob is RKO's movie-making mainstay; Chris goes to Santa Monica Canyon School; and Jimmy's at military academy.

HONOLULU LOONY

■ One evening a few weeks ago, a native bell boy at the Royal Hawaiian Hotel in Honolulu, answering a call for ice water in one of the better suites, tapped gently on the door and stood silently waiting for it to open. Nothing happened, so he tapped again, louder. In a moment he was convinced he either had the wrong room or the occupant had changed his mind about ice water. Just to make sure, he tried the door handle, found it worked and stepped into the living room. It was dark, so he walked toward the terrace and deposited his tray on a table and turned to leave. Then he wished he'd never been born.

Behind the door to the terrace stood a tall, stooped figure. It wore a deerstalker cap, with the peaks flopping over the ears. It had long black hair that hung in ratty strands and partially covered the face. And that face! The eyes were squinted into evil slits. The nose was long, curved and quivered like a rabbit's. A long, silky moustache was on the upper lip, hanging almost to the apparition's black-clad shoulders, and the mouth was pinched and lewd and pursed about half a dozen unsymmetrical teeth that jutted straight out—as though anxious to bite and carve a tic-tac-toe on a soft throat with a single nip.

The bell boy stood his ground for a terrible instant, and then with a hoarse cry shot from the suite like a meteor with good legs. He didn't stop for a breath until he reached the desk, where he began a tale of horror that had the clerk's hair on end. The man at the desk quickly went to the file and looked up the tenant of the suite. Then he went back to the bell boy and told him to take the rest of the night off and try to get some sleep. And when the boy had staggered away, he had the operator get the guest on the phone.

"Is this Mister Jerry Lewis?" he asked when the ringing telephone was answered. (Continued on page 62)

The end of The Affair

This first-hand account, special to MODERN SCREEN, tells what really called a halt to the sizzling love affair between Lana Turner and Fernando Lamas.

BY IMOGENE COLLINS

■ It happened at the Marion Davies extravaganza where there were 600 guests, 20 serenading violinists, a Greek sarcophagus filled with countless magnums of champagne, and more photographers and their relatives than you could shake a stick at.

This is how it happened: Ava Gardner had no escort because her Frankie was playing the Hotel Chase in St. Louis and, besides, she was as mad as a wet hen at him. She called Lana and asked if it would be okay if she accompanied her and Fernando Lamas to the Marion Davies shindig.

Lana said it would be swell. She and Ava are great friends because they have had so much in common. Lana was married to Artie Shaw and so was Ava. Lana, for a short tempestuous period, saw no one but Frank Sinatra, and so did Ava. Gardner, however, carried the affair a step further. She married Frankie.

Anyway, on this fateful night in October, Lana, Ava, and Fernando Lamas drove up to the 25-room mansion of Miss Davies on Beverly Drive. Within a few minutes they were all partaking of the liquid refreshments therein offered. They danced, gabbed, had their pictures taken. (Continued on page 68)

Jealous of the attention others paid Lana at the Davies party, Lamas quarreled violently with her that night.

Lana and Ava, who shared escort Lamas, were all smiles at the party. But heartbreak was ahead for both actresses.

John's devotion to photography (which abated when he discovered wrestling) kept Russ and Pati plenty busy posing for his "Derek Production."

BY ALICE HOFFMAN

■ Russell Derek, who will be three years old in April, has little conception of the fact that his father is famous, that his father is strikingly handsome, or that a good portion of the female population of the United States regard his hilltop home in Encino as the nearest thing to heaven. Russell regards his father only with the critical and loving eye of a small boy.

He can remember the days when John used to come in the nursery and look thoughtfully down at him. There was a pride in John's eyes that told Russell he was something special, and yet once in a while, particularly when Pati wasn't in the room, the senior Derek would shrug his shoulders. When, he wondered, would this small lump leave his bed and become a human being who could handle a catcher's mitt? Russ obliged in his own good time by following the course of nature and finally, in the last year, has developed into the bouncing, bursting, bombastic boy that John had pictured all along. As a matter of fact, Russ has exceeded all his father's expectations.

Ordinarily, John takes the roughhouse as a matter of course, but when he's had a long day at the studio and (Continued on page 71)

JEANNE CRAIN CAN POSE FOR WHISTLER'S MOTHER ANY DAY IN THE WEEK...

■ The phrase "mother-of-four" usually conjures up a mental picture that is pretty dreary. It summons an image of a creature characterized by slumping shoulders and tired eyes, whose stockings are slightly wrinkled and whose world has narrowed to the point where she is concerned solely with getting splinters out of fingers, beans out of ears and bugs out of beds.

Jeanne Crain has a quartet under six years of age and yet always manages to look like a breath of spring. Although she has servants in the house and a nurse to care for the children, a mother is still a mother and must necessarily worry through illnesses and injuries; must see to mental and spiritual development; and must take care lest she step on the sprout who is currently trying to insert a marble in her shoe. The point is that Jeanne Crain leads a life that is crammed with activity and interests, so many of them that, were she childless, her days would still be fuller than those of the average woman. Yet she comes through (Continued on page 81)

■ Last winter a streamlined train puffed its way along the cobweb of tracks leading into Chicago's Dearborn Station. The aisles were lined with passengers impatient to alight after the long trip from Los Angeles. Not so Gene Nelson. He still sat in his compartment, his lap strewn with papers, a pencil poised in mid-air. He gazed unseeing at the foot locker under the bed. "You know," he said, "I think I ought to do the soft shoe number before the patter about making musicals. It would give the routine a better change of pace."

His wife Miriam picked up her hat. "You know," she said, "I think you ought to collect yourself. We're coming into Chicago."

Startled, he looked out the window and saw the city's crowded skyline. "But I haven't decided yet about half the act." He ran his hand nervously through his hair. "Brother, I wish this train would just keep on going."

Chicago was Gene's first stop on a ten-week vaudeville tour. It was the first time he had been out of Hollywood in years, and it would be the first time he had been on a stage since Lend An Ear in 1949. He was as unstrung as a politician on election day and stayed that way until his first performance was finished.

Then he knew everything was all right. The theater had been filled to capacity and people had stood three abreast in the side aisles. The audience was with him—he could feel it—a warm feeling that rolled up over the stage in invisible waves, and the final ovation was deafening. Backstage, he pulled Miriam to him. "It's almost like a miracle," he said.

It was the first time Gene had any inkling of his popularity. Back in Hollywood he had gone on making picture after picture, and although fan mail had come in to the studio by the truckload, he had little idea of the rising tide of affection felt for him by thousands of movie goers. Nobody told him; he didn't think to ask; and if he had, any answer given by a single person in the impersonal surroundings of a business office would not have carried much weight. Taken out of Hollywood, where the citizens are rather blasé about movie stars, and plunged into the bright lights of other cities, he got the surprise of his life.

When he and Miriam left the theater in Chicago that night they were caught up in an exultant mob. Gene's immediate reaction was fright, for it is a terrifying thing to be caught in such a milling crowd. He was lifted off his feet and backed into a brick wall. He looked for Miriam, couldn't find her. Looking into the young faces before him, he realized that he was dealing with a mob of teen-agers. He recalled all the things he had read about these kids, how they went on rampages; tore up theater seats; ripped clothes from their idols, and generally behaved like escaped lunatics. He began to feel annoyed, and then one little girl directly in front of him looked up apologetically. "I'm sorry, Mr. Nelson, I can't help pushing—it's the people in back of me."

Gene changed dancing shoes after each number during his vaudeville show in Chicago last winter. The ten-week tour marked his first stage appearance since Lend An Ear in 1949.

LIVING WITH LUCY

by Marwa Peterson

Lucille and Desi have lived in this house for 12 years.

■ By the end of the afternoon there was only one word to describe the condition of the carpet-soft lawn behind Lucy and Desi Arnaz's home. That word was "havoc." Strewn with crumpled tissue paper, balloon fragments, and other party drippings, the grass had also been rutted by dozens of baby-strollers and perambulators, while the rock garden had been gradually relocated by a half-dozen two-year-olds.

The reason for this mayhem was simple. The half-pint set of upper-crust Northridge society had gathered at the Arnaz ranch to celebrate the first birthday of Lucie Desiree.

"Honey," cried Desi as one of the grim realities of fatherhood suddenly dawned on him, "do we do this every year?"

"Of course," said Lucille heartlessly. "Quick Desi, the camera. Dee Dee's going towards the cake."

"COME LIVE WITH ME AND BE MY LOVE" SAID DESI

This glass-enclosed porch runs the length of the house, takes a lot of wear and tear off the living room. The furnishings, bought 12 years ago, have stood up very well under the strain of Lucy and Desi's many parties.

TO LUCY TWELVE YEARS AGO. AND THEY'VE LIVED, AND LOVED, IN THE SAME HOUSE EVER SINCE!

HOUSE OF THE MONTH

Bright red carpeting and bold cabbage-rose wallpaper give the living room a homey, comfortable look, without sacrificing the abundance of color Lucy wanted. Her antique furniture, bought years ago, is very much in vogue now.

A magnificent silver tea service graces the dining area of the living room, but Lucille and Desi have given up trying to live up to it. The cranberry glass lamp over the table is a real antique.

Yellow and grey is Lucy's favorite color combination; she used it in her bedroom, when they moved into the house, and nothing has been changed since, except to reorder the dotted Swiss. The red chair is a note of contrast.

The fabulous nursery, done in the same yellow and grey color scheme as Lucy's bedroom, was planned as a continuation of Lucy's room. It's cost came to more than the cost of the house!

Home life for the Arnazes is a round of dizzy daings and quiet relaxotian. Here, they indulge in bath as Lucy keeps up a running wise-crack on the TV script Desi is reoding.

Their beloved little Desiree has her own opartment, camplete with private patia and ployground. Her wing af the house will soon be shared with a new sister or brother.

The five ocre citrus ronch that Desi and Lucille own is very similar to the plantation in Cuba on which Desi grew up. Even the pool is a copy af the one Desi's family hod.

of a daughter. To make things easier for him some one had lifted little Desiree onto the table. She reached for a fistful of cake. As she turned to offer some to her Daddy, her year-old legs failed her. She tottered, lost her balance and sat smack on the gooey layer cake.

The party crowd roared. Parents laughed until tears came. The kids cooed and applauded for more.

"I must say things have changed a heap around here," one of Lucille's oldest friends said to Grand-mother Ball.

Mrs. Ball mused for a moment. "Yes," she agreed, "and then again, no."

The newest factors in the lives of Lucille Ball and her Latin lover Desi are of course their new-found fame as TV stars and their new-found happiness, after years and years of trying, as parents.

When Lucille, after 11 years of marriage, discovered herself pregnant one afternoon, she quickly ordered the addition of a nursery wing to her house. The construction of which turned out to be a little less elaborate than the re-modeling of the White House. What started out to be an added room and bath soon grew into a project of PWA proportions.

Contractors pointed out to Lucy and Desi that local building codes prohibited the addition of a room that would have to be entered through an existing bathroom, an ordnance which prevented Lucy from having the baby's headquarters set on the other side of her own dressing-room-bath.

"It was murder," Lucille recalls. "For years I'd been hoping and praying for a child. Now that it was on the way I didn't care how the architect planned the nursery. All I knew was that I wanted to be able to step from my gray and yellow room into the matching gray and yellow room of my baby. It was the dream of my life. I didn't realize it would have to develop into a Federal case."

That, of course, is exactly what happened.

"Only thing to do," said the architect, "is build an addition in the shape of an inverted L."

"Okay," said Lucille. "Build it."

Then Desi came home that evening. Among other things he's a frustrated architect.

"What's going on here?" he demanded.

"An inverted L," Lucy answered nonchalantly.

Desi looked at the blue-prints. "All wrong," he said at length. "It'll take a year for the nurse to go from our kitchen to the baby's room with a warm bottle. What we need near the nursery is a kitchen." So they included an apartment-size kitchen in the new wing—also a separate heating unit, a new plumbing system, and new cabinets.

When it was all finished, Desi totaled up the cost. "Comes to $20,000," (Continued on page 65)

No tears for Mitzi

■ It was a sweltering 11 o'clock under the blazing klieg lights on the 20th Century-Fox set of Take Care Of My Little Girl. The director reached for the microphone to say, "Try it again, everybody, please." But somebody beat him to it.

"Lunch everybody!" rang out a clear soprano.

Before the director could recover himself he was caught in a stampede of extras and bit-players bee-lining it for the commissary. When the dust cleared he could just make out Miss Prankster herself, Mitzi Gaynor, waving him a cheerful good-bye.

Director Jean Negulesco shrugged his shoulders. That's what he could expect from a sassy, bubbling, merry (Continued on page 73)

by Mike Connolly

■ It is Christmas-time in Hollywood as it is all over the world. Christmas trees are alight with the sparkling red, green and silver of Yuletide, and tinsel gleams brightly, aglow with the Christmas message of faith and good cheer. The very air seems to proclaim, "The Christ Child is born again." And all mankind rejoices anew.

I am a happy person this pre-Christmas Day. But a sad one, too—because of what I have seen. It was the sort of thing you usually don't associate with Hollywood—gay, glamorous Hollywood—and least of all during this joyous season.

I have been a guest of Esther Williams at a party—a Christmas party—and what I saw at this party made it different from all the others I've ever attended. Why was it different? There were the usual Holiday decorations, the usual bewhiskered Santa Claus, paunchy and playful in his red velvet suit trimmed with white fur, the usual distribution of gifts in their gay wrappings, the usual red-and-white striped peppermint candy canes and the open lace-work stockings ready-stuffed from the dime store— (Continued on page 80)

For three years, Esther Williams has devoted as much time as possible to the Los Angeles Nursery School for Visually Handicapped Children. She has given the school a specially built, heated swimming pool and trained swimming teachers for the kids.

The children generally tend to be afraid of the water at first. This is because they enter a new, dark world where their support seems to be gone. With proper help they are quickly waned over.

Esther reaps her reward of hugs and kisses from the affectionate children. They know her as "Aunt Esther"—movie stars mean nothing to young eyes that never shall see.

COOP REBUILDS HIS LIFE

■ A tall, handsome, hollow-cheeked cartoonist named Frank James Cooper was ambling along Hollywood Boulevard one June morning, about 25 years ago. Dressed in his only suit, a worn grey tweed, he was hungry and depressed because no one would give him work as an artist. As he stopped outside a bakery to savor the sweet warm odor of freshly-baked bread, two pals he'd known back home in Helena, Montana happened along.

"How you doin', Frank?" one of them asked. "Still drawin' them funny pitchas?"

Cooper grinned wanly. "I'm selling advertising on a theater curtain," he admitted. "Know anyone who wants to buy some?"

His friends shook their heads.

"Look, Frank," the older of the two said, "that ain't no way of makin' a livin' here in Hollywood. Jess and I—we come along a good thing. We double for those big-shot movie cowboys who don't know how to ride. Whyn't you do the same?"

It took Frank Cooper all of 20 minutes to sprint from Hollywood Boulevard and Gower to the old Fox lot on Western Avenue. If there was one thing he'd learned on the Montana ranches, it was horseback-riding. Luck was with the lean, lanky youth, and he was hired as an extra at $10 a day.

In the many years that have elapsed since that moment, which to him is still unforgettable, Gary Cooper has become recognized as one of the greatest box-office attractions in the history of the American cinema.

HEARTBREAK AHEAD

■ Ava Gardner, as MODERN SCREEN predicted six months ago, has left Hollywood. She will probably not return until May 1954.

Her salary for that year-and-a-half overseas, according to her new contract, will approximate $220,000 on which she will pay no federal income tax. This is, even for Hollywood pocketbooks, not hay.

But neither is it the reason Ava's on her way East. She is clutching at the straw that will take her away from Hollywood, and, she hopes, the troubles which she believes stem from there.

Ava doesn't particularly like Hollywood. She never liked it to begin with, and since her marriage to Sinatra it's become a downright phobia with her. She feels that Hollywood is basically an atypical community in which marriages perennially hover above the precipice of disaster.

From time to time she has looked at the list of Metro contract stars, those women whom she admires and with whom she works so closely. Practically all the top-notch actresses with the exception of Jane Powell, have been divorced: Lana Turner, Cyd Charisse, Janet Leigh, Esther Williams. And it's the same at other studios.

There are so many temptations in the movie colony; so many designing and beautiful females that a marriage must have a rock-firm foundation in order to survive. Ava's hasn't.

Ever since she and Frank returned from Philadelphia, married, and tried to settle down in Hollywood, Ava has had the (Continued on page 74)

24 DAYS OF DAVIS

"I've been trailing Bette Davis around for a month, on the set, at her home, everywhere. I'm beat! Miss Davis? Fresh as a daisy, of course," reports Katherine Albert.

Dear Mr. Saxon:

This "news note" has turned into a biography. I have a strange new life—my life with Bette Davis.

Here's what happened. I was minding my own business, but my husband, Dale Eunson, wanted me to write a screenplay with him. It is called The Star and naturally we wanted Bette Davis to play it. All writers want Bette Davis to play in all their stories.

So we sent her the script and the next thing I know we are driving up in front of a big, rambling, old-fashioned house in Hollywood. This is a switch in itself, for Hollywood stars just don't live in Hollywood any more. They wouldn't be caught dead outside the three B's—Brentwood, Beverly Hills and Bel Air.

Miss Davis' costume was as unusual as her neighborhood. Stars have a costume for everything—"Costume in which to be interviewed," "Costume for going to the studio," "Costume for story conferences." Bette in an old (Continued on page 56)

After a cordial welcome, Bette flopped into a big over-stuffed chair, pounded the script with her hand, and said, "This script is great. Just great." End of story conference. As Dale and I pinched our ears to make sure we had heard right, a pretty five-year-old child came into the room. This was B-D (Barbara Davis. Her father is Betty's third husband—William Grant Sherry). But you would know who her mother was if you met B-D alone on the streets of Cairo. "She's like me in every way," Bette said when we commented on the obvious physical likeness. "It's frightening."

I now know what she means. B-D often came on the set to visit her mother. She liked pretty houses and lovely clothes well enough, but most of all she enjoyed the scene in a real jail where her mother was behind bars. Dealing heavily in the cliché department I asked her if she was going to be an actress. "Oh, yes," she said. "I'm going to be an actress and be in jail and everything."

The next time we saw Bette Davis was in producer Bert Friedlob's office with the director, Stuart Heisler, and Sterling Hayden, who co-stars with Bette.

How can I describe the woman we met there? A charge of high voltage electricity? Dynamite? Bristling vitality? Strong adjectives—like strong men—pale before Bette Davis. That day she was a thoroughbred race horse pawing at the barrier. She was the loaded pistol with a finger on the trigger. She was Columbus about to discover a new world. To hear her enthusiasm one would think she'd never made a movie before.

Of course she has made dozens of them. Yet, in filming The Star she encountered a number of firsts. Bert Friedlob had never produced a Davis picture before. Stuart Heisler had never directed her. She had never played opposite Sterling Hayden. Ernest Laszlo had never photographed her. And we had not written for her. She was trying us on for size.

The story is about a movie actress who almost destroys herself by her determination to keep at the top, by her desire for power. She eventually learns that it is more important to be "just a woman" than a "career."

In discussing the character Stu made a rather unfortunate remark. "Let's face it," he said, "this is a silly woman."

Bette shot him a look. "She is not silly, and we must get it settled right now, or we will never see eye to eye. She is not silly. She's sick."

When Stu explained that what he meant to say was the character sometimes behaved in a foolish way, everything was okay. It could have been a crisis, for Bette must understand the core of the character she plays before she can begin to act.

SHE'D have to understand, for she couldn't be more unlike this heroine. Bette Davis is vitally concerned with her family and her home. When she's not actually at work Bette gives Gary and her children her undivided attention. Besides B-D, there are Margaret Mosher Merrill who is almost two, and Michael Woodman Merrill, who is still a baby. Bette and Gary adopted these two after they were married in 1950.

Gary adores all the kids. It thrills Bette to watch him with her older daughter. He and the girl are as close as they could be if Gary were B-D's own father. Closer, perhaps.

Their parties are wonderful. Bette is the kind of person who, when she has a New England clambake, serves clams baked under cornhusks on the sand. You scoop out the juicy meat and throw the shells into the sea. She is a realist in life as well as on the screen.

Gary knows that in being married to Bette Davis he has a problem. He asked a friend, "What can you do for her? I can't buy her a Cadillac—I can't afford it. Besides, she has a Cadillac." He found the perfect answer himself. All sorts of small, unique gifts. On the set one day he came in with a pair of unusual pictures, charmingly framed. One was a New England kitchen and the hanging pots and pans were miniature rounds of real copper. She was more delighted with this present than if it had been a Cadillac.

EVERYONE was nervous the first day of shooting because you can hear anything about Bette Davis. "They" will tell you she is a temperamental, stubborn woman. "They" will tell you she is the witch of the world. And "they" will quote their own scripture to prove it. Now, maybe if she has a script she doesn't like and a director she cannot respect she can be a witch, but all I can tell you is our own experience. She has been nothing but reasonable. She has not once clung stubbornly to an idea just to be stubborn. When someone suggests an idea, or a piece of business she can be enthusiastic about it. More so even, than if it were her own.

When I say "reasonable," I mean Bette Davis reasonable. For example, a scene was to take place on a sail boat. She did not tell anyone that she has a neurotic fear of small boats, which goes back to her childhood. She thinks it began when she was 12 years old. A bunch of kids her age were out on a sailboat in Cape Cod. She became so frightened that, rather than sail farther out, she jumped overboard and swam a mile to land. She thought she'd overcome that fear when she arrived in San Pedro with the rest of the company to do the scene.

There was an unfortunate comedy of errors. She was called out on the boat long before she was needed. There was a stiff wind and a heavy ground swell, and the only man aboard who knew how to man a sailboat was Sterling Hayden. He could not give it his undivided attention because he was playing scenes with Bette and Natalie Wood, who is Bette's daughter in the picture. The boat was crowded by actors and crew. It was enough to make anyone nervous. Bette did the only thing to be done. Call for the water taxi and go back to land.

But no phobia can overcome Bette's sense of responsibility. The next day she was on the boat swallowing fear and salt spray, and when you see that scene on the screen you'll never realize that she was scared stiff. When it was over she said to me, "Where do fears like that come from? I'm trying to raise my kids so they won't be burdened with agonies like that."

Most actors prepare for an emotional scene by "getting into the mood," and cannot help but hold the mood long after the scene is finished. Not so Miss Davis. Perhaps Bette has a file of emotion deep inside her to call upon when it is needed. Perhaps it's because she's a great artist. Anyway, this is what happened.

She was sitting on the set talking to Bert Friedlob. She had a reasonable, legiti-mate beef. She was factual and firm. Stu Heisler called her for the scene. It is one of the most dramatic and poignant moments in the movie—a page-long monologue into a telephone. She went before the camera. Stu said, "Action." When she heard that word a charge went through her. Immediately she became the character. She picked up the telephone receiver, dialed and spoke. The scene ended. The tears were streaming down my face; Dale was crying too. Stu Heisler walked into the set speechless with emotion and put his arms around her. Every member of the crew had tears in his eyes. Then Bette said, "How about that? I remembered every word!"

PEOPLE get a delayed reaction from her. A director introduces an actor—"Miss Davis, Mr. Irish,"—and they go into an intimate scene. The scene will be made, the director will say, "Print it," which means "Okay," and the actor who has done the scene starts shaking. "Golly," he'll say. "It just hit me. I did a scene with Bette Davis." Her craft is so big that it hits the actor afterward, because she immediately puts him at his ease.

Although Bette is not a superstitious girl she does believe that "everything good happens to me in the rain." It had been blazing hot for three days and, as you know, it never rains in California in the summer. But on this particular morning there were great splashes of water on the windshield as we drove to the studio. When punctual Bette arrived, there was a call for her from Gary. He told her the happy news that she had won her income tax hassle with the government. It had been hanging fire in the courts for 11 years. The winning of the case means no money for Bette, but if she had lost it she would have been very broke.

When Gary told her she had won she screamed as only Bette Davis can scream. She said, "I think I'm going to faint," but her voice was so strong that no fainting woman could have uttered the words. There were more reasons than one why she was so happy about winning the lawsuit. Her New England stubbornness and sense of fair play entered into it.

She had been advised to "settle." She had been told that "Nobody can win against the government." But Bette knew that she was right, that this was a precedent case and if she won it others would be helped. It would have been much easier to make a settlement out of court. For one gruelling day she thought it over. "No," she said. "I can't settle. I'll fight."

She was put through all kinds of cross questioning on the stand. Four days of it. And then the waiting. And now the reward. She had not "settled." She had not compromised, and she had won, paving the way for others to win.

It would be wrong to give the idea that she's a saint. That she is not. As an example, a co-actor told this story:

"I knew Bette when she was a kid. She was just getting a toe-hold in the theater in summer stock on Cape Cod. She was full of beans, big-eyed—just the way she is now, a great worker."

"The director of the stock company was a woman who was a great stage star. This actress didn't like young girls very much and she gave Bette a rough time. A really rough time."

"Years passed. Bette became the first lady of Hollywood. She was queen of the studio when the actress was brought out to make a test for a part in a film."

"Bette just appeared on the set that morning and stood there watching her letting her know that she had remembered those rough days. And I love Bette for it. I thought (Continued on page 64)

The "'unk" in question doesn't understand this attitude at all. But his wife Lydia does. Though she proudly agrees, she's also a little amused. After nine years of marriage she's used to the routine. She's even inured to the eager females who bombard her with queries about the man in her life. She thinks nothing of it when a nurse, taking her case history in a hospital, asks starchily, "What was the cause of the death of your grandparents, Mrs. Heston?" then melts out of control and adds without taking a breath, "Oh, Mrs. Heston, I think your husband is so wonderful. I'M WONDERING ABOUT LOVE

■ When I made my first trip back to Italy, my meetings with my old friends always made me sad and worried. Each time I would run to them, crying out in delight, "Hello, Niccolo! Hello, Maria!" because they might be boys or girls I had grown up with, and I knew their hearts were full of fun and we had had so much fun together. But each time they would be as if on guard against something. They would smile, only so much, and they would respond very quietly, not like they used to at all. And then they would sit talking, strange and stiff with me. In their minds, I knew, they were thinking, "Oh, she has gained great success and she is not one of us now." And in my mind I soon started thinking, "Yes, I have gained much. But why do I feel as if I have lost something . . . something terribly important?"

I know now. It was not only that I had been cut off from the past, it was that in this past, when I was nobody, the eyes of my friends had to be honest. They saw just me, because I was just me, nobody special. If they then liked me I could depend on it as a true liking. But now it is not so simple. If tomorrow I met the one man whose true love could mean my whole life's happiness, how would I know? He himself might not even know. He might think that he loved what I was as a woman and person, and yet come to find out it was who I was as an actress and professional personality. "It is not enough that you have to find a good man," I say to myself now. "You have also to be very, very lucky!"

Like all Italian mothers, my mother thinks that when I marry it should be someone she considers suitable. She, like any other mother, wants security for her daughters. She speaks to me of this often, but I do not agree.

My answer is a very simple one. I have to marry him, not she. I have to live with him, not she. She is hurt and thinks I should take her word for it that I will be happy. How can I do this when what I am gambling is my whole future life? And also, when from all that I hear, and from what little experience I have had, I am convinced the odds for meeting the one man who can mean happiness must be less than even.

No wonder Pier's got men head-over-heels about her. She's always been shown as a demure child, never as the highly-appealing young woman she actually is!

Sitting in mid-air, Pier follows instructions of coach Harold Voise, who is teaching her how to fly through the air on a trapeze for her latest movie, MGM's The Story Of Three Loves. Pier used to study ballet.

It is true. I have had proof. The first boy I knew in Hollywood I liked so much. He had a charming manner, he talked with intelligence and I enjoyed being with him. Like a girl will, I would try to imagine how it would be if he were my husband, and the pictures I got of us together were very pleasing. It was like this for several months. Gradually, however, with more time, something not good began to show through in places. He seemed to adjust his personality automatically to the importance of the people he met. For little people he didn't give much of himself; for big people he had lots to give and could be very warm. I couldn't help wondering how he would have treated the Pier Angeli I used to be before I stumbled into the movies. Which of his many kinds of smiles would he have for her? And I knew. It would be one of his small ones, one of his tiny, quick ones, with his eyes looking over my head to see if anyone else more interesting wasn't around. He went out of my dreams very quickly after that.

With others it does not take so long to see through them. The most common of these are the boys or men who seem to think that the first thing to do when they meet a girl they like is make a big impression. Some of the things that then happen are almost crazy. One man, not in the movies, tried to present a white Jaguar to me. My mother nearly went out of her head thinking (Continued on next page)

I might accept it. There was no danger.

And then there are some boys who get the idea that, since I am a newcomer to Hollywood, they might be able to take advantage of my ignorance. One of these drove me home from a friend's swimming party one afternoon. As he stopped the car, he turned to me and without even a word tried to kiss me. I pulled back and he acted as if he was surprised. So it was I who asked, "Did I do something wrong? Is this supposed to happen?"

"Oh, sure," he said. "A boy always kisses a girl good-night. They think nothing of it."

"You mean any boy, with any girl?" I asked. "She doesn't have to feel that he likes only her?"

"Sure, that's how it is here," he said. "It doesn't mean anything."

"Oh!" I said. "I don't believe it. But if that is true, I don't think I'll bother. Let's go in."

He opened his mouth to argue and then closed it and looked annoyed. He took me to my door in silence.

Later on my girl friends told me he was trying to pull "a fast one." But they didn't need to tell me. I knew. With all that a kiss can mean, most girls don't go around making no more of it than if they were saying "Hello" or "Goodbye." This is a boy's game, and women everywhere are smarter than that.

In Italy a girl cannot marry without her parents' consent, can sign no kind of contract, in fact, until she is 21 years old. She is completely in her parents' hands as far as her personal life is concerned. I say this is in Italy. For me it is also true in the United States. My mother cannot change her beliefs just because we are in another country. This I understand, but sometimes it's a little hard when we talk about what I can and cannot do. It isn't that I think it is a bad custom. It has always been my feeling that if you bottle up a girl until she is 21, she does not overnight acquire great brains and control just because the law says she is now legally responsible for herself. I say to my mother that a girl has to start meeting boys when she is younger, be with them, get used to them, so she can build up poise for later when she has to deal with men. After all, if a girl has high morals, boys are not so hard to handle. But to start right off dealing with men can be frightening.

But when I say that I should be permitted to go out with boys, my mother always has proof that I shouldn't—a newspaper clipping. She reads the story to me. It says I am holding hands with this one, or going places with that one, or deeply in love with another. Once, soon after we got to Hollywood, my mother came to me with a columnist's guess that said I was already secretly married to a Brazilian boy. "People talk when they see this kind of thing," she said. "It is not nice. That is why I do not want you to go out alone with boys."

"People will talk anyway," I said. "It is always like that." Many times we have talked of this, my mother saying my reputation will not be good. I try to make her understand that a girl must get used to being a woman, not shot out like from a cannon when she is 21 . . . but she cannot appreciate this and I do not want to make her unhappy. I know she is not afraid that maybe I am in love with someone. She knows that when it really happens I will tell the whole world. I won't have to tell. My feet will dance out with the truth.

My friends who know my mother say that I am becoming Americanized and my mother is still an Italian. But this is not too true. She has eyes to see what is going on in this country, and even if she is against the freedom girls have in going out on dates, she likes the greater rights American wives have. In Italy the husband is the boss. The men are more possessive and, it seems to me, more jealous, as husbands. It is not that they are a different kind of men, I feel that they have been brought up that way. Someone once said to me that maybe I would be happier if I married an Italian boy. I said, "No!" right away . . . not because I would not like or want to be married to an Italian. I would . . . only it would not be fair to him. After living in America I could no longer accept the position in society that an Italian wife must. It would cause trouble that would really not be his fault but mine.

Because the husband is going to be the boss, Italian parents seem to leave the whole job of teaching a girl about life to him. They do not tell their daughters the things that parents in this country often tell their children . . . what is good and what is evil. Oh, most children find out, from friends, from elders whose words they listen to with big ears, but not always in the right way. So it is to her husband a girl must look for what is the real truth, and it is on him she is supposed to depend for both guidance and knowledge the rest of her life. I could no longer come to a man with such a submissive attitude.

Since it is an accepted thing in Italy that the parents know best what a girl should or should not do, there are not even discussions about it . . . just orders. Even to this day my mother has never sat down quietly with me to talk over my problems . . . and I have just become 20! At times I have tried to convince her patiently that I must have more liberty. And a tiny bit I have won. Some boys, a few whom my mother has met and approves, are permitted now to take me out . . . that is, not just out, but to a definite place or party my mother knows about. But to know a boy, to have him call up and take me where he has planned—that I cannot do. When I am 21

I shall gain this right . . . and I am trying to curb my impatience.

ONE boy, who is a trusted friend as far as my mother is concerned, is John Barrymore, Jr. In this I agree with her. I think he has something fine to him and that the whole world will know it some day. It is funny, because before I met him I had heard unkind things about him. One day at a party which was very dull, and where my sister and I sat arguing with each other just to pass the time, this tall boy with black hair was introduced to me and I liked him immediately. From that day on, my liking for him has increased. There came another day when he touched my heart to tears. He dropped over and said he had heard I was going to Europe for a picture. "I felt I had to bring you something . . . for luck," he said. "I know it will bring you luck."

And he gave me . . . a treasure . . . his father's old leather make-up kit! If you know what kind of a compliment this can be to a young actress, what it could mean! I tried to tell Johnny, and that's when I cried. But I didn't have to tell him. He knew.

When I went to Mexico on location for my picture Sombrero I thought that perhaps there, away from Hollywood, my mother would be more lenient with me. But it did not turn out this way. My mother's first impression of Mexico was a frightening one . . . though later she learned to like the country. We were taken to a bull fight in Mexico City by Miguel Aleman, son of the President of the country. When my mother saw what was happening in the arena, she was horrified. "Oh, the poor bull! The poor bull!" she cried.

Miguel turned to her in some alarm and cautioned her. "You must not say that," he said. "The people here do not feel this way about the bull and will resent it."

It is true that there are too many stories in the newspapers about Hollywood romances and that they do give a bad impression. On that trip to Italy I went to see my old director, Leonide Mugoy, who started me in pictures. He acted hurt. Then, "How could you have become engaged so soon in Hollywood?" he wanted to know. "Poof! Just like that! And was it wise? And how could you have done this without letting me know, so that I wouldn't have to read about it in the papers?"

It wasn't so, of course. He had read the false story that I had become engaged to Arthur Loew, Jr., who is a great friend, but to whom I have never been engaged. But Leonide had been worried that I had made some sudden, thoughtless move, without sufficient consideration without real thought.

BECAUSE I was so young when I started in movies in Italy, most of the men I worked with were sure I knew very little about life (which was not far wrong) and sought to protect me with advice. This time when I came back and they, too, had read all the items about supposed romances in Hollywood, they were annoyed with me. "We will adopt you, and any boy you go with will have to come and talk to us first!" they warned.

No, I am grateful to have a mother who has my welfare at heart, even if we do not always agree how it shall be guarded. I am grateful that my friends concern themselves over me and give me advice. But what I sense I really need is what every young person needs, and this I pray for every night. I pray that I shall be lucky in love. Believe me, in these prayers I don't see the Cadillac at the door, the mink coat and the house busy with servants. I don't want to complicate my chances. What I'm thinking about, dreaming about, is just love . . . true, lasting love. END

The clerk's voice took on a pleading tone. "Please, Mr. Lewis," he said. "You've got to stop scaring the bell boys and the other guests. We can't have that sort of thing here you know."

"All I did," said Jerry, leaning back on a lounge and leering into the phone, "was try to be friendly when the man delivered the ice."

"The boy claims he saw the Devil standing on your terrace," the clerk said indignantly.

"He did, eh?" asked Jerry thoughtfully. "Tell you what. Ask that man from the joke store to come back here right away—and then send me up some more ice water in about half-an-hour."

The clerk groaned, hung up the phone and quickly swallowed another aspirin.

It was just a simple incident in the life of Jerry Lewis, a jesting moment while on his vacation, but to the Hawaiian citizens involved, it was another terrifying experience—one of many odd and uncomfortable experiences that had been happening ever since Jerry Lewis and his group had descended on the Hawaiian Islands.

Not even a Jerry Lewis vacation is orthodox. Most people plan their holidays, check the travel folders, consult the ticket agents, pack carefully and with restraint. They plot itineraries with an eye to making the most of each hour—and when it is all done they shuffle off to rest and play and rest some more and store up energy and memories to last for the balance of the workaday year. Not Jerry Lewis.

62 The Honolulu vacation we are speaking of was born in an instant. Jerry, his wife, Patty, his press agent, Jack Keller, Mrs. Keller and Jerry's doctor, Martin Levy were sitting in the Lewis play room one night when the phone rang for the twentieth time. Jerry groaned.

"If that thing rings once more," Jerry cried, "I'm going off someplace and hide. I'll go some place where nobody can get me on the phone."

Keller answered the call. "He's not here," he said. "I think he went to Honolulu."

That was as far as he got. Jerry slammed the phone out of Keller's hand and back on the hook.

"That's it," he shouted. "Patty, pack the bags."

"Where are we going?" asked Patty.

"To where he said," Jerry snorted. "Honolulu. Come on, we'll leave right now—before the phone rings again."

"You can't go any place that fast," said Keller. "You've got to make reservations and get tickets and . . ."

"Then go ahead and do it," said Jerry. "And you and your wife come along, too. It was all your idea."

"But you're supposed to be taking it easy," interrupted Dr. Levy. "You've just finished a tough tour."

"Okay," said Jerry to Keller, "get him a ticket, too, so he can see that I take it easy. We'll leave in an hour."

THERE were protests, refusals and then a lot of telephone calls (outgoing)—and while they didn't leave in an hour, the next morning at ten o'clock found the five travelers at the Los Angeles International Airport boarding a trans-Pacific plane for Honolulu. And while the airport employees weighed and stowed the outrageous mass of luggage, Jerry just stood back and sneered his superiority at his four companions—who had said it couldn't be done.

The 11-hour trip across the ocean was uneventful, only because Jerry Lewis, who can't stand still five minutes on the ground, immediately falls asleep when he gets on a plane and doesn't open his eyes until he is nudged awake by a hostess who wants to tell him to fasten his safety belt for a landing. But when he did open his eyes it was to greet a sight he says he'll never forget. Like emeralds on a shimmering royal blue cloth, the islands lay below. Fringed in white froth, where the breakers caressed the beaches, they looked like nothing real that anyone in the party had ever seen.

It was about six o'clock in the evening when the ship skimmed in for a landing at the Honolulu Airport. A warm rain was falling, although it was so light no one appeared to notice it but as the plane flew through the moisture-laden air dozens of small rainbows were created and passed through and when the wheels hit the ground and sent up curving curtains of spray it seemed to the passengers that they had landed on a field of sparkling jewels. The ship was taxi'd to the administration building and when the doors were opened a group of dancing girls met the disembarking passengers and piled leis around their necks, a traditional welcome to a visitor to the islands.

The first night at the Royal Hawaiian was unforgettable for more than one reason. The first was that the exotic beauty of Honolulu was breath taking, and another that Jerry never let his wife and friends forget that the whole thing—the transport from the common world of California to this tropical fairyland was the result of his own active little mind. They thought he was insufferable in his smug demand for credit, like some pompous magician who had pulled several good sized rabbits from the same hat.

They had dinner in the four-room Lanai suite shared by the Lewises and the Kellers, and with the French doors wide open, ate to the soft swish of the surf washing the beach below them. The others very nearly threw Jerry from the balcony when he cocked a concerned eye at Dr. Levy and remarked:

"You look a little tired to me, Doc. You better get a bit of rest in the next few days."

The good Doctor, who had packed, made arrangements to have his practice looked after by an associate, and spent the night before going over the conditions of his patients with his replacement just to please Jerry, wanted, at that moment, to prescribe a stomach ache for the comedian.

THE first day in Honolulu was devoted to a visit to the United States Naval Base and a pilgrimage to Pearl Harbor. The Navy men heard Jerry was in town and asked him to drop by the base for a morale-building chat. And Jerry, with Captain Cross, a veteran escorter, spent the early part of the day touring the ships and land establishments of the fleet and meeting the men. Then, late in the afternoon, the party was taken to the graveyard of the mighty ships that were sunk on December 7, 1941—a sacred place that is also the last home of the hundreds of men of the Navy who died in the first furious hour of the late war.

This was the only time during their stay in Honolulu that Jerry Lewis was serious. He took Patty by the hand and led her to the wooden platform that has been erected over the wreckage of the battle ship Arizona. They stood silently and read a bronze plaque commemorating the men who had gone down with her that said: "May God make his face to shine upon them and grant them peace." And then they threw ginger leis upon the silent water and watched them carried out to sea—and they spoke a silent prayer.

Well, when the group finally got around to checking the luggage that night they got quite a shock. It was figured roughly that they had carried about 300 pounds of excess baggage, including eight bags of golf clubs, sufficient, Jerry had thought in his own evaluation, to last them for a week of golfing. And, it seemed, everyone had plenty of clothes for sitting on the beach, but hardly anything to walk around the town in. Among the five of them there was one pair of slippers—and Jerry ruined them the next morning when, in an effort to get them away from Keller, he chased his press agent right into the ocean while wearing them.

The clothes problem became acute the second night. Jerry and Jack were scheduled to drop in for a cocktail with a group of GI's stationed in the city. Because it was hot, they slipped into a cocktail lounge in the hotel for a cold glass of beer, but the barman refused to serve them because they were not in tuxedo whites. And they also found to their consternation, that they would not be allowed into the hotel dining room for dinner without formal attire.

"Well, what are you going to do," said Jerry philosophically. "So we'll eat in the room."

"I didn't," said Keller indignantly, "fly across the Pacific Ocean to eat in a hotel room. This trip should have been planned."

"It was planned," said Jerry innocently. "We're here, aren't we?"

That Keller couldn't deny, so he shook his head in confusion and hustled the comedian off to tell a few jokes to the soldiers downtown.

THERE was precious little rest for the party during the next six days, but lots of fun. Each morning they all got up together and played a round of golf at one of the Island's beautiful courses. Then they hurried to the beach and lay in the sun and played pranks on one another—and the poor guests of the hotel. They became brown as natives, soaking up the clear, white sun as though it were the last they'd see of it. Several times the management must have considered barring Jerry from the strand in front of the hotel, because he was constantly thinking up new ways to harass any victim in sight. But the guests really seemed to enjoy it. Watching Jerry clown about the beach was like having a ringside table at the Copacabana with no check to pay when it was over.

The beach boys particularly loved Jerry. Most of them are of the pure Hawaiian strain, rare on the island, and they love fun as much as children. One of them, a strapping fellow of 60 named Chick Daniels, was pal to all of them, but became a real buddy to Jerry. He would lie in the sand and recount for hour after hour the tales of his adventures on the Mainland when Arthur Godfrey had him flown to New York to play the ukulele on his TV program. And Jerry made him repeat the yarns over and over again, fascinated at the new facets each time the stories were told. The others didn't realize what he was up to until they were just about to leave—and Chick told his adventure for the last time. He sounded exactly like a jive hound from the Catskills, for his pleasant Hawaiian speech had been deliberately adulterated by Jerry until it was liberally sprinkled with terms that the comic used in his vaudeville and night clubs turns.

Everybody, of course, had cameras and it was estimated when they left for home that an extra 50 pounds was added to their excess baggage weight by the exposed film they had accumulated. Of them all Jerry was the best photographer, and he drove the Doctor and Keller, who both fancied themselves fair camera hands, crazy with his complete disregard for exposure meters and other gadgets—and always came up with perfect pictures.

While the girls took it pretty easy, keeping out of most of the horseplay, they, too, suffered at the hands of Mr. Jerry Lewis. One experience they will never forget is the ride they took on a Catamaran—a sail boat with a split hull that rides the surface of the sea on narrow runners very much like a sled. The thing looked innocent enough, and after being assured that it couldn't capsize, the girls agreed to go for a short sail offshore. Jerry established them at the front of the craft, straddling the foreparts of the runners, and suggested that they hold on to the guy wires to the mast for a more secure ride. Then, after only having been checked out on the thing once, he hoisted full sail and headed for the open sea. He had neglected to tell the girls that a Catamaran is the fastest sail boat in the world—but the girls discovered this for themselves in short order.

With Jerry at the helm and handling the sail, the craft suddenly took off like a torpedo and hit a speed of better than 40 miles an hour. For an hour Jerry maneuvered the boat among the tall waves while the kids hung on for dear life, each new wave giving them a fresh bath and the scare of their lives. And when Jerry finally brought the craft ashore the sun bathers were treated to a very unusual sight—two very wet and very angry girls chasing a lanky young man down the white strand of beach intent on murder. They finally had to give up that small revenge, though, when Jerry began howling in pretended terror for the police, claiming the girls were trying to rob him. They quickly ducked indoors and Jerry stayed out until he was sure their anger had abated.

JERRY and Patty Lewis and their friends did so many things during their week in Honolulu that it would take pages and pages to even list them quickly. And most of them were real tourist things. They visited the oriental shops, where Jerry pretended to speak Chinese, completely confusing the stoic shopkeepers who felt they had stumbled upon a new and rare dialect. They visited the famous volcano, but nobody would get very close, not knowing just how far Jerry would go for a practical joke. They scouted the island to get pictures of the rare tropical blooms—and hacked their way through jungles of exotic growth just a few miles from town.

They even went to the movies, but mainly as a gag. Jerry learned that all seats in Honolulu movies are reserved, so he wanted to test the efficiency of this system. They bought tickets, went inside, and for 15 frantic minutes most of the theater help was snatching Jerry from illegal seats while the audience, not recognizing him in the dark, completely forgot the picture to watch the chase of the tall shadow around the auditorium.

Pretty soon it came time to leave. By this time the party was used to the sudden rains and, like the natives, completely ignored them, preferring to stand outdoors and wallow in the beautiful rainbows that are as plentiful in Honolulu as surf boards. It was raining again when they took a taxi from the hotel for the airport. The group was silent as they stood waiting for the word to board the airplane. They didn't want to leave, really. Off in the distance, the inevitable Hawaiian music, bidding departing guests to return again soon, made them unhappy. Jerry cracked a joke about "Where is the guy who says now we leave beautiful Honolulu?" and everybody laughed, but half-heartedly.

THE next day Jerry and Jack Keller were sitting in Jerry's playroom in California when Dean Martin called.

"I been thinking about you, Jer," said Dean. "You know we've got another couple of weeks before we go to work—and you ought to get a little rest. Go away somewhere. I've been trying to get you for a week to suggest it."

Keller heard the dialogue as clearly as though Dean were in the same room. He watched Jerry closely.

"Yeah," said Jerry, "where do you think I ought to go? Jamaica? How do you get there?"

Keller didn't wait to find out. He hit the floor running and didn't stop. He didn't want to leave for Jamaica in an hour, not him. END

Bette is uncompromising and she can be unforgiving, but her humor saves her from ever making a fool of herself. For example, it is well known that Bette has fought with many of her directors. And when Bette fights she doesn't kid around.

There is a line which has Miss Davis declare, "I always get along with my directors." In the scene was a fine actor, Minor Watson. During rehearsal he forgot his next line after Bette's. Bette read her line, "I always get along with my directors." He did not speak. Bette said, so that all could hear, "You're right. Dead silence is the only answer to that."

She has so much confidence one would think she could never be scared professionally. Yet she was frightened of the musical revue she is doing on the stage. It is a show called Two's Company. She sings in several sketches—she has a low, throaty voice. "I'm really a bass," she says—and she still wakes up in the middle of the night in a cold sweat wondering if she will remember the lyrics of the songs when she gets on the stage. She needn't fret.

Sterling Hayden told me one day, "Sometimes when I start to do a scene all of a sudden the lines will go. I know them perfectly well but I can't think of a word. Then Bette says her line. All of a sudden there is mine. Her confidence transfers itself to me and I am able to give it back to her. Does that make sense?" Knowing Bette, that makes good sense.

SHE is completely without affectation. We were talking one day about a scene where the heroine must make like a big movie star, coming on the set in the grand manner, patronizing the crew with fatuous "thank-yous" for any small service, playing up to the producer. Bette said, "I couldn't do it myself. I'd get so bored with all that nonsense." Yet she tells a story on herself about once when she, along with numerous other celebrities, was at a banquet. Everyone was taking bows. The master of ceremonies made a juicy introduction of a great artist, a first lady of show business. Bette says she had her smile all set and was in a half crouch ready to spring up to take the bow, when the M. C. with a flourish said, "I give you Miss Laurette Taylor."

It really embarrasses her to accept an accolade. "I just don't know where to look." Yet she is the first to give credit where credit is due. She is fascinated watching other actors work, and she will come away from a scene to say, "Now that's a real actor."

Before we began the picture the only question in the producer's mind was Bette's ability to work hard enough to complete the picture in 24 days, the schedule necessary to get her to New York in time to start rehearsals on her Broadway show. Since she is in almost every scene this would be a prodigious chore. Also three-fourths of the picture would be photographed away from the studio to take advantage of live backgrounds—a shipyard in San Pedro, a coffee shop in Los Angeles, a real auction gallery—and this constant changing of location is difficult and gruelling.

He could have saved himself an ulcer. This woman works like a demon. She is never so much as half a minute late. She is ahead of time. She is ready before she is called for a scene. She knows her lines letter perfect when she reports for work. She can make a change of costume in nothing flat. Friedlob's problem has been keeping up with her.

Just watching her is so exhausting that when I come home at night I'm too tired to do anything but fall into bed and feel ashamed, knowing that Bette is at home learning lines for her next day.

And for the rest of my days I'll never forget the 24 days—which seems a lifetime, but good—I spent with Bette Davis.

Best always,
Katherine Albert

Desi nodded happily. Lucille nervously ran a hand through her carrot-colored hair. "Jumping catfish," she said, "the whole house only cost us $16,500 originally." "Who cares about money?" Desi cried. "We're gonna become parents."

Right now the only regret Lucy and Desi have about the new wing is that they didn't build it larger. As all their fans know, come January, the nursery will have another resident.

WHEN Lucy and Desi first laid eyes on the Desilu Ranch it was a forlorn bit of property with a partly-furnished house set in the middle of five acres of seedling citrus trees. Time has lent improvements. The grove of 350 trees is now so thick you can hardly see the white frame house and the odor of orange blossoms is overpoweringly sweet. Not satisfied with raising oranges alone, Desi has planted avocados, peaches and an arbor of grapes. To remind him of the plantation he'd been raised on in Santiago, Cuba, he's also built a rustic pool with a waterfall at one end. Today when people ask Lucille what kind of a home she lives in she says, "Oh, just a little ranch-house overshadowed by trees, a nursery and a rock-edged pool."

Lucy and Desi bought their ranch when it was a part of the Sesson Oil Estates. It was located on picturesque, uncrowded land in the San Fernando Valley far removed from Hollywood. For years friends have urged them to sell the ranch and move to a more convenient neighborhood. Now that their television success has skyrocketed their income, they are advised to live up to their position and buy a home in one of the more fashionable sections like Bel-Air, Brentwood or Holmby Hills. So far they've resisted all pressures. "We're people of fixed habits and true love," Lucille explains. "Besides when the new road gets finished, we'll be able to make it to the studio in 20 minutes."

Inside the house Lucille has replaced one set of organdy and one set of dotted Swiss curtains. Otherwise the furnishings are the same as they were 12 years ago. "Early Northridge," Lucille styles them, laughingly.

If you probe the decor more deeply, the comedienne tells you quite frankly that she furnished her home with cheap antiques. When she and Desi were first married they couldn't afford priceless Early American pieces so she settled for a slightly later period in American design. She concentrated on buying 19th century antiques. She picked them up at antique shops and second-hand stores for a song. These items were easy to come by before 1941, because most of the people who'd settled in the San Fernando Valley were farmers from the Middle West. As these families prospered they began selling or giving away their heirloom furniture in favor of new things. They flooded the Valley furniture shops with Morris chairs, Victorian love seats, and old wicker rockers.

LUCILLE selected the things she needed—a couch for the living room, two fire-side chairs, an old wood box, a chaise longue for her bedroom, a quaint dressing table, and lots of oil burning lamps. She had most of her things recovered and re-finished to fit into her bright new color schemes. When the job was done she stopped her antique shopping completely, never giving the subject another thought until a year ago when she found she needed a rocker and a few tables for the new rooms. Once more she began frequenting the shops along Ventura Boulevard. Much to her amazement she discovered that her period pieces are now very scarce and just as valuable as the older antiques.

"It could only happen to Lucille Ball," says her friend Eve Arden, whose own home is full of the expensive Paul Revere type antiques. "She does something for a wacky reason all her own and years later it turns out to be a big craze. Right now all the decorators in town are trying to lay their hands on Victorian items. The same way with her plunge into television. We thought she was nuts making the move when she did. But look at 'I Love Lucy' now. That's why the rest of us are following. She's a smart and independent cookie, that one."

In spite of Eve's wholesale approval of Lucille's behavior, some of the Arnazes' more chi-chi acquaintances hint strongly that Lucille should re-do her house if only for a change. These hints take the form of gifts: French lamps, contemporary statuary, modern paintings. Lucille lets the free advice roll in one ear and out the other. She politely thanks the donors for their gifts and promptly stores the stuff in her roomy playhouse. She has no more desire to change the look of her surroundings than the spelling of her own name.

A few minutes in the homey atmosphere of her living room and it's obvious why she and Desi won't consider re-doing anything. Their home is so warm and inviting, any change would have to be for the worse. In furnishing the living room Lucy used a bright red carpet and a bold cabbage-rose wallpaper. In many homes this combination would be garish; in theirs it's cheerful and invigorating, just right for them.

The room is also full of unusual furniture pieces that mark it with individuality. An old clock face mounted on legs, for example, serves as an end table. The cranberry glass lamp over the dining table is authentic and very rare. When it's lighted the crystal and silverware on the table seem to glow with a rosy hue. Over the fireplace hangs a Kramer primitive and in one corner a snow scene by Balz.

For those of you who aren't art collectors, Balz is the signature of artist Lucille Ball. Several years ago when she and Desi were vacationing in Florida, the tall carrot-top decided to take up oils. "It was either that or go deep sea fishing with Desi. I got such a kick out of seeing color and form come alive on canvas that now I paint whenever I have a couple of free hours."

Lucille's technique is to sketch her subject matter in charcoal on the spot. She then takes the sketch home and works on it by night light usually on the kitchen table. Occasionally she'll work in the glass-enclosed porch which boasts a linoleum-tile floor and rattan furniture.

This light, open room is ideal for parties, and Lucille uses it a good deal when she's home during the day. She happens to be a conscientious keeper of scrapbooks and photo albums. Any spare afternoon will find her down on the floor surrounded by clippings, paste, and scissors.

The large master bedroom at the Desilu Ranch is probably the prettiest room in the house. It has a clean, freshly starched look that seems to suit Lucille. The colors of yellow and gray are her favorites and all the furniture is comfortably old. One wall of the room consists of nothing but mirrored wardrobe closets. Lucy has a weakness for clothes so she took over the closets some time ago. What won't fit behind doors, like her hats, gets stacked in plastic boxes in one corner of the room. They make a novel decorating touch even if they aren't Victorian headgear.

DESI'S SUITS have long since had to be hung in the one guest-room closet which is a good reason why the Arnazes don't have many house guests. The other reason involves a party which they gave soon after they moved into their home. Everybody stayed very late and one couple spent the night. The couple got up the next morning and still in the spirit of the party, drove home, picked up their child and came back to Lucy and Desi's guest room. They stayed nine months.

"Of course we had a lot of laughs," Lucy says, "but that taught us a lesson. We took the twin beds out of the guest room and left one narrow couch. We call it the mother-in-law bed, and it's meant for my mother or Lolita, Desi's mother. They're welcome any time. As for other overnight guests, that's out. Desi and I planned a home for us and our families and that's the way we want to live in it."

"But how about your children?" I asked. "When they grow up and start inviting their friends to spend the night—what will you do then?"

Lucille Ball wrinkled her brow. "Never thought of that," she said. And then a bright gleam came into her eyes. "I know what," she suggested, "we'll build a new wing, especially for them." END he wuz mobbed!

(Continued from page 43) Suddenly he realized that he was surrounded by fans who meant him no harm, but were caught up in the madness of the moment. He smiled. "If you can give me room I'll stand here and sign autographs if it takes me all night."

DURING this and a subsequent tour, Gene spent countless hours signing autographs and talking to fans. He began to know them for the first time. At home he hadn't come in contact with teen-agers, had no idea how to talk to them. His friends had children about two-year-old Chris' age, and Gene's life was so empty of people in the 12-to-16 bracket that he wasn't acquainted with their way of thinking. Once he took his mother to visit some family friends he hadn't seen in years. Their 14-year-old daughter had been five the last time he saw her, and he still thought of her as a little girl. It wasn't until he was helping his mother back into the car that he learned he'd been sitting in the same room with an avid fan. "You ought to know," his mother said, "that Charlotte spent the entire day getting ready for your visit tonight."

In Toronto, Canada, he received phone calls at the theater from three girls, each of whom wanted to start a fan club for him. He invited them to come backstage and suggested they pool their efforts, whereupon one asked if he could come to her house for a coke party between shows. He was doing five shows a day and his usual intermissions consisted of a nap until the next showtime. But he couldn't resist the girl's pleas, and took a cab to her home after the second matinée. There were hors d'oeuvres, and cokes, and two freshly baked cakes. The house was crammed with teen-agers and half the neighborhood found some excuse to stop by during that hour. Gene found an opportunity to corner the mother. "You've gone to so much trouble," he said. "I certainly appreciate it, but I hope this hasn't put you out too much."

She looked at him wide-eyed. "Why, of course not. I'm happy to do it. The children get so much pleasure out of seeing you. If they start this fan club—well, I can't think of any pastime that would make them happier, or keep them out of trouble better."

IN CHICAGO one morning, Gene received a letter signed by two girls. "We saw your opening and stayed to see two shows. We'll be back on Saturday and will stay right through the whole five. We'll be sitting in the front row and wearing roses—"

He spotted them during the first show and noticed they were there through the second. After the third show he told Miriam, "Those kids are still out there. They must be getting hungry." They slept during the movie that interspersed Gene's appearances and during the shuffle between performances, frantically held onto their seats. By this time everybody backstage knew about them. When Herb Jeffreys came off during the last show, he grinned. "Those kids are still down there!"

Gene shoved a hand in his pocket. "Here honey, go out and get a couple of ham and ryes, will you?" he said to Miriam.

He had the conductor put the sandwiches on the bandstand, and after his opening number on his last show told the audience, "Before I go any further, ladies and gentlemen, there are two girls here who've been in the front row for every show today. I can't dance another step until I know they've had something to eat."

The grip threw a spotlight on them as they stood up to catch the sandwiches tossed by Gene before he went on with his act. Afterward, backstage, he went out the stage door and found them waiting bleary-eyed, but blissful, for him. "Hi," he said. "How were the sandwiches?"

"Oh, we didn't eat them," said one. The other said, "Eat 'em! We're going to frame them!"

In Pittsburgh, a girl about 15 asked Miriam if she could talk to Gene for about ten minutes. It seemed she had problems at home: a father who was in jail more often than not and a mother who drank. There were four children younger than herself and she wanted to know what she should do.

"Have you asked anyone else about this?" Gene said.

"Oh, no! I'm too ashamed!"

"But why do you come to me?"

"Well, you see," said the girl, "I've seen you in the movies and read about you in magazines, and it seems to me that you lead a nice kind of life, and are wise, and might know about these things. It's—" she swallowed, "it's kind of like you were my big brother."

SOME of it was funny and some of it was sad, and always there was the same quality of wistfulness that goes with hero worship. Looking for the reason for this adulation of teen-agers, Gene had to go back into his own adolescence. He remembered that following his long championship of Laurel and Hardy, a whole year of his life was taken up almost exclusively with his devotion to Chandu, the Magician. To keep peace in the household, Gene's mother switched to another brand of soap so that he could send in box tops in exchange for assorted Chandu tricks. Later, he became a fan of the Mickey McGuire two-reel comedies, featuring Mickey Rooney as a Bowery-type character who wore a derby with a split crown. On the afternoon that Rooney was to appear at the Wilshire Theater in Santa Monica and distribute a basketful of derbies with split crowns, Gene paid his admission early and waited for the big moment in high anticipation. When he went home without a hat, it was a new low in his life. Remembering these things, he understood the spirit of today's teen-aged fan and willingly gave his time; or his autograph, or advice, if they wanted it.

They wanted all sorts of things. They wanted to know what Gordon MacRae is really like. They wanted to know how to get into show business, or the name of a good dancing teacher. They wanted him to autograph their hands, their arms, and in one city they asked for his cigarettes as souvenirs. After he'd given away a few packs somebody lit on the idea of his autographing the cigarettes. They wanted his clothes, too, and Gene was always apprehensive that, in a crowd, if one fan started the ripping procedure the idea would catch on. He found them, very fortunately, very polite about it. They always asked first, "Would you give me your scarf?" Then Miriam would come to the rescue. "Not that scarf, dear. I gave it to him on our anniversary."

Jane Wyman, commenting on a certain actor, said, "I know he's a gentleman. I saw him go through a door that said so."

He didn't go through two dozen cities without bumping into occasional trouble. There were always the crowds. Once he was pinned against a plate glass window and felt it give in back of him. Another time he called for police when he spotted one girl beginning to faint. Still another day, a woman with a baby in her arms was caught in a crush, and Gene maneuvered her so that he could brace himself against the mob in order to protect her. Being rushed by a crowd isn't an enjoyable experience, and yet he remembered that it is the crowd itself that's objectionable, not the individuals who comprise it. He began to feel duty bound to brave the waiting fans and once, when he sneaked out a side door to grab a bite to eat and was confronted by a solid line of people waiting to see him, he actually felt embarrassed.

In one city Gene had finished his last show and faced the ordeal of leaving the theater laden with two boxes of shoes, his music case and two suitcases filled with costumes. Getting through a crowd with that kind of baggage was impossible and he knew it, so he and Miriam left through a side door and made their way to the street. There was the crowd, packed solid to the curb, and when Gene spied a cab across the street he began to run for it. Somebody saw him and the cry went up, "There he is!" and 300 people moved as one to the other side of the street. That was the night Gene felt his only temptation to slug a female. She grabbed his coat collar and hung on with a death grip while he tried desperately to get the cab door open so that he could get his luggage safely inside. He pleaded politely with the girl but she wouldn't budge, and eventually he grew angry. "Now, look," he said. "If you don't want any trouble, let go of me. Let's be adult about this and stop acting like a stupid idiot." He appealed to the crowd. "If I can just get my things inside the cab I'll be glad to sign autographs for you."

Just then a gentleman slightly in his cups hove onto the scene. "Well, well!" he crooned. "Romeo himself. Lemme through, everybody! Make way for the press! Whadya say yer name was, bud?"

It's TIMES like these that make movie stars wish they'd taken up plumbing instead, but such an unruly bunch has been rare in Gene's experience. He learned after a while how to handle such situations and found that humor usually eased the tension. If he appealed to their intelligence and threw in a joke or two it almost always nipped hysteria in the bud. When that didn't work he ladled out discipline. Like the theater in Chicago. It was bitter cold during the engagement, and because Gene sweats like a stevedore when he finishes his act, he didn't go outside but chose instead to talk to them from the window of a small room facing the alley. He sat on the window sill and had signed endless autographs when he noticed he was signing over and over again for the same people. The fans were shoving to such an extent that those closest Gene were almost boosted in through the window.

"Some of you are cheating," he said. "I'm going upstairs and if you want me to sign more you'll have to line up in an orderly fashion and stop pushing." He grins now when he tells about it. "I must have sounded like old Father Hubbard telling off his kids."

There were occasional hecklers in audiences too, but Gene's fans usually took care of them quickly and efficiently. If not, Gene took over himself. One obstreperous young man, wearing a leather jacket and long hair, sat in the front row and kept up a running commentary to his date. Gene ignored it until the time he was changing his shoes while announcing his next act.

"Hey, bud!" hollered the heckler. "Gimme a shoe. Throw it t'me!"

"You sure you can fill it?" said Gene. The heckler's teen-age date howled with glee. "That's telling him, Gene," she yelled.

On the whole, Gene found his fans to be pretty nice people. There were slight touches of wackiness, but it was a wackiness common to the teen-ager, and he figured if he'd once spent five hours waiting to be presented with a battered derby hat, he was in no position to criticize. He learned that today's teen-ager is a new brand of fan and thinks them much better mannered than the hysterical type that used to batter celebrities and overturn cars.

"Maybe they still do those things, I don't know," he says. "But I was lucky. The kids I saw and talked with were sincere and loyal, and I got the feeling they were real friends."

He was particularly impressed by the respect with which they treated Miriam. They included her in all their functions, inviting her to their schools and homes, and Gene says she was asked for almost as many autographs as he was.

GENE feels that hero worship is common to everyone. We all go through the phase and gradually outgrow it, but at the time it is a deeply serious thing. Only a minority carry a banner for the rest; these are those who turn out inevitably at the appearance of any celebrity, the ones who collect autographs or pocket handkerchiefs or are content to go home simply having laid eyes on the particular hero or heroine.

There are few stars in Hollywood who are without a fan club comprised of their loyal followers. Unfortunately, many of these stars know nothing about the activities of their fans for the simple reason that they don't care. There are a few, such as Joan Crawford and Alan Ladd, who so appreciate the efforts in their behalf that they have kept their fans as friends during the years. You can add Gene Nelson's name to the short list of those grateful stars. He should care, and he does. END

Everyone in Hollywood knows that Lana Turner loves to dance. For a little girl—she is only 5 feet 3 inches—she has incredible stamina, having done so much of her youthful training on the various dance floors of the movie colony.

When the screaming and shouting and popping of the photographers' flash bulbs stopped for a moment, Lana leaned to her right and to Lex Barker, the tall Tarzan from Port Chester, N. Y., who was once married to Arlene Dahl, mentioned something about a dance.

Every inch a gentleman, Barker was on his feet in a second. Within two seconds he had Lana in his arms and they were whirling around the dance floor having the merriest of times.

Sitting in his chair sulking, was Fernando Lamas, the man Lana had termed "my bull of the Pampas." The more Fernando saw of Lex and Lana the angrier he grew. He kept his anger no secret. In fact he was downright vociferous, so vocal that Brad Dexter and Ben Gage, Esther Williams' husband, inched up to Barker and said, "Lamas is getting awfully mad. We think he's looking for trouble."

Lex Barker realized that Lamas and Lana were unofficially engaged, that they'd been going steadily for months, that Lana was just waiting for the financial settlement from Bob Topping before she tripped to the altar with her handsome Argentinian, and as he himself says, "I didn't want any trouble. Fights for a guy like me are no good. Whatever happens I have to be in the wrong. If someone starts up with me and I take a poke at him, I'm a big bully. If I don't I'm yellow. I lose either way."

So Lex brought Lana back to Fernando who by this time was completely free of inhibitions. "Look," Fernando said, "if you want to make love to her, make love to her." This isn't exactly what Fernando said, of course. He embellished his verbal outrage with more colorful language, in fact it was so colorful that Lana covered her face in embarrassment.

"Sit down," Fernando shouted at Lex. Barker looked around for his own date, Susan Morrow. "I thought you were my friend," Fernando continued. "Now I see what you are. You want to fight?"

The rest of Lana's party could see what was coming, and they intervened.

"Why pick on Barker?" Ben Gage said to Lamas. "Pick on me. I can lick you."

"Go away," Lamas said.

"Not only that," Ben added. "Even Esther can lick you."

Lana, of course, was outraged and indignant at the behavior of her Latin lover. He took her home that night, and while neither of them will tell what happened, apparently a battle royal ensued.

Next morning Lana Turner let it be known that insofar as she was concerned, Fernando Lamas was a thing of the past, a transient romance of yesteryear; she would sooner marry Mickey Mouse than a man who couldn't hold his temper.

One columnist called MGM and asked if, because of this widely-publicized fight, the studio would abandon the production of Latin Lovers, a film scheduled to get under way with Lana and Fernando in the starring roles. The studio said the picture would roll according to plan, but intimates of Lana confided that she would ask for a new leading man.

Lamas, when questioned about the film, said, "There is no reason why Miss Turner and I should not make the picture. Our private lives have nothing to do with our professional ones; or they shouldn't have."

Several columnists thought otherwise. One hinted that Lamas would not have gotten the lead opposite Lana in The Merry Widow if Turner hadn't sponsored him. Another quickly answered the hint by pointing out that Lana had done nothing to foster the Lamas career. Fernando had been discovered by John Carroll who had called him to the attention of his wife Lucille Ryman of the MGM talent department. Lucille had recommended Lamas to the consideration of L. B. Mayer. L.B. had listened to Lamas sing and had signed him on the basis of the audition.

Lana was kind to Lamas during the shooting of The Merry Widow—she could have monopolized all the closeups as Betty Hutton did with Ralph Meeker in Somebody Loves Me—but Lana is the most thoroughly unselfish actress in Hollywood. One of the basic tenets of the philosophy she lives by is "to harm no one," and she scrupulously adheres to that. No one in Hollywood, and that includes Lamas, can point the finger at Lana and say, "She did me wrong."

LANA likes to show that she has a lot of fight, lots of stamina, that adversity never gets her down for any considerable length of time. When Ty Power flew out of her life, for example, and married Linda Christian in Rome, Lana took up with Bob Topping on the rebound.

When Topping packed his bags and moved out of Lana's Holmby Hills mansion, Lana began dating her leading man, Fernando Lamas.

When the Lamas love affair blew up, Lana determined to show how little affected she was by it all, flew down to Tijuana with Ava and Frank Sinatra on the following weekend to take in the bullfights. After the corrida, she dated Luis Solano, the Mexican matador. They spent a good portion of the night dancing in the various Tijuana hotspots.

Lana, however, was fooling no one. Her heart had been broken again, and everyone knew it, quick recovery or not.

There are some people who say that Fernando Lamas never had the slightest intention of marrying Lana Turner. Certainly when you asked him about it, he would refuse to comment on the marital possibilities of their love affair. At one time he said he couldn't possibly marry Lana since she was still officially married to Bob Topping, and he was still officially married to Lydia Lamas.

But then Lydia after receiving a financial settlement and assuring herself that Fernando would support the offspring of their union, a delightful little girl, Alexandra, agreed to give Fernando his freedom "for whatever purpose he chooses to use it."

Lydia Lamas is a sweet and beautiful woman. She was Fernando's second wife, and her one desire was to see that the actor remained happy. When her constant nervousness—she is a highly tense person—caused him distress, she agreed upon a separation. When he asked for a quick divorce, she agreed to that, too. She went to Nevada, and in six weeks Fernando was legally free to marry again.

A friend who knows Lamas well, says, "This guy got himself in a pretty pickle. My own opinion is that after going with Lana for several months he decided that she wouldn't be the right wife for him—in fact, he didn't want to get married to anyone. He saw that Lana was consulting with her attorney Neal McCarthy, that it was just a question of time before she also got her freedom from Topping. He would then be in the awkward position of having to marry her merely because the public expected him to. My analysis may be completely wrong, but I think he resented that position which is why he acted up at the Marion Davies party, and the whole affair with Lana went up into thin smoke."

Whether subconsciously Fernando Lamas was seeking this rupture, or whether it was spontaneously born of the immediate circumstances makes no difference. The important point is that once again in her choice of lovers Lana Turner has struck out.

At this point her "bull of the Pampas" is dating Arlene Dahl. It may well be that Lamas thinks he is getting even with Lex Barker by dating Arlene, but if he does think that way, he's very much mistaken. Barker doesn't give a hoot with whom Arlene goes out. She began her freedom by dating the lawyer who had procured her divorce, Greg Bautzer. From Bautzer she was graduated to Lamas. She claimed in court that Barker had once referred to her as "a hick from Minnesota," a name which she contends caused her great and grievous mental aggravation, which is pure baloney, of course. Arlene and Lex broke up because of career trouble. Arlene has no intention of abandoning her career and settling down into domesticity.

LANA has always been willing to abandon her career for mate and children. The men to whom she's been married have always insisted that she remain a movie queen. It was her glamor that attracted them, not her ability as a cook. But where she can, she always insists upon marriage.

What happens to Lana now?

This is the question all Hollywood is asking. Certainly she has had as many men in her life as any woman of 32 in the world. The list starts with Greg Bautzer and reads like a Who's Who: Artie Shaw, Ty Power, Huntington Hartford, Bob Hutton, Howard Hughes, Peter Lawford, Turhan Bey; it even includes Steve Crane, a restaurateur of sorts, a term generically used in Hollywood to include anyone in a restaurant from a bus boy to Mike Romanoff.

With each of these Lana has guessed wrong. The price for her erroneous judgment has been heartache.

She was quite taken with Fernando Lamas, largely because her affection for him was gradual in its development. Ordinarily Lana falls for a man like a ton of bricks, the swooning sudden, violent, and impetuous. With Lamas, it was different. At first when Lana met him on the set of The Merry Widow she wasn't at all sure she wanted him for a leading man. When she discovered subsequently that he was separated from his wife, that basically he was a charming and talented man, that he seemed to admire her beauty and fame, her antipathy became interest. Later her interest became fondness; fondness developed into love; love kindled their passion.

There are Turner fans who, knowing about the fight at the Davies party, insist Lana is crazy to have given up Fernando merely because he manifested a little Latin temperament in the form of jealousy. "It shows he loves her," one waitress in the MGM commissary recently pointed out. "My husband wouldn't care if I danced with Joe Dracula."

Lana has come to the somewhat belated conclusion that it takes more than love to make a good marriage. It takes mutual respect. In this case she thought it was lacking, at least on Fernando's part.

She is shedding no tears about his loss, however. For years now she has regarded men in much the same light as she regards taxi-cabs. "A new one comes along every few minutes."

But ever-optimistic Lana will have to take off her rose-colored glasses, and forget that love is blind, if she ever wants to pick herself a winner.

what I remember particularly is the second act when I was supposed to run onstage and cook some potato pancakes (really flat bran muffins) for Lucille Watson. One night I was so busy chatting with someone offstage that I missed my cue and Miss Watson had to improvise. She walked right to the stage entrance where I was dreaming and said, "Where is Babette? Oh, there you are! (looking at me so sharply that I woke up and realized what I had done). I was wondering where my potato pancakes were!" I ran onstage with them. But when the act was over I burst into tears that lasted all through the intermission and I'm still embarrassed about it.

SMALL GIRL TO BIG GIRL STUFF: I always liked jewelry as a small girl and, what do you know, I still do! But I used to see myself in sleek black satin, slinking around as a Dragon Lady type femme fatale, and with this conception I parted in late 'teenhood. Black satin is stunning as part of a dress now, a cocktail dress, say, but never fashioned slinky.

I was one of two children in our family, but my mother was one of ten children and I always felt I wanted a large family.

It was at 13 that I got my first party dress and my first perfume, both as presents from my mother. The dress was pink and so today pink is one of my favorite colors; pink was the dress, with a blue ribbon, blue sash and cut with a full skirt. The perfume was Blue Grass, darn near a whole quart of it there must have been as I remember the size of the bottle, and the first place I put a spot of perfume was behind one ear as per what the grown-up ladies were doing. I now have a variety of perfume and I can think of no more pleasant confusion than standing before them all, trying to decide which will best fit the mood I want to be in for the occasion I am dressing for. You might not think I was enjoying myself if you judged by the serious expression that I know comes over my face at such times—but I am.

DO YOU LIKE BETTY BLYTH better than Ann Blyth as a name? Or Barbara Blyth or Babette Blyth, or Beverly, Beatrice, Bertha, Blanche, Bernice, Bella or Bess? I just wondered because that's what the studio had me wondering about when I first came to Hollywood. They thought it would be more euphonious—and catchy—if my first name started with the same letter as my last name, and the above were some of the suggestions. I didn't like any of them. I wanted to stay Ann. For months I kept worrying that a change would be made, but nobody ever got around to making a definite decision and I kept my "Ann." Thank goodness!

THINGS I DON'T KNOW WHY: Why my uncle Pat tells you he is going to play a record of one of my songs and picks "Lazy Bones" as I sang it over WJZ in New York when I was five. Why I rooted for Brooklyn to win the last World Series even though I was raised in Yankee territory (Manhattan). Why the little boy who used to put my pigtails in the inkwell never would pay any attention to me any other time! Why a playmate of mine got so mad when another boy wrote her name on a telephone pole that she got a hatchet from home and started to try to chop the pole down! Why I don't like browns (except for some lively shades of it), or marching wallpaper. Why I don't like sugar on my grapefruit and why it was that the first cup of coffee I ever drank happened to be black, without cream or sugar, and I have loved it that way ever since. Why I like the outside, well-done cut when it comes to roast beef but also enjoy hamburgers "cannibal-style" as long as my aunt gets a chance to "taste it up" with her pet spices. Why I keep things like spoons in my pocketbooks and cooking recipes in my books and scripts. Why I always carry two mirrors—both exactly the same—yet think one of them is my favorite and that I can tell which one it is. Why I never hopped on a bicycle and joined the wheeling traffic on the streets of Dublin when I visited there as I was fairly aching to do—and never kissed the Blarney Stone, on the same visit—as it would have done me no harm at all to do, at all, at all!

PSYCHIATRIC NOTES: I like all the elements except wind—the hurry, flurry of it makes me feel the same way. I love rain (either when I am inside in front of a fire, or when walking out in it and feeling it splash on my face). I like quiet, assured people. I have a compulsion to fix things I notice wrong about people's dress—a collar awry, a dress zipper not closed all the way, a button not securely caught. I want to tell them about it—like I'd want to be told if there was something wrong with me. I think I could be a good public inspector of a new kind—standing on a street corner and calling people's attention to necessary wardrobe adjustments. Would you like such a service? Just draw up a petition and have a half-million of your neighbors sign it.

(Continued from page 51) in 75 films, which have grossed more than $150,000,000. He has starred opposite every actress you can think of with the exception of Greta Garbo. He has earned over $3,000,000 in salaries and percentage profits. And despite these tremendous accomplishments, he remains today modest and incredibly unspoiled.

Henry Morgan, a featured player who acted with Gary in High Noon, Cooper's latest picture out this month, says, "When a guy gets to be as famous as Coop, you expect him to put on airs, to get temperamental, and blow his top every two minutes. But not this guy. He's easy to work with. He never bothers anyone, and he's all for giving newcomers a big break. He never objects when the producer uses him to introduce an unknown actress. Fact is, he considers it an honor."

THE public, of course, has always regarded Gary Cooper as a simple, basic man of action. In their eyes he is a combination of all the great roles he's played. He's Longfellow Deeds, John Doe, Sergeant York, the Virginian, and Lou Gehrig. He is the kind of man all little girls want to grow up to marry, or as the late Robert Benchley once so pithily described him, "Coop gives the impression of being the last remaining virgin in Hollywood."

Actually, there is a good deal of difference between the Gary Cooper the movie fans feel they know so well and the real Gary Cooper.

Take, for example, the questions of demeanor, manner, and attitude. The popular impression of Cooper is that he's a fairly rough-hewn Westerner who talks haltingly in a slow mountain drawl, and who finds great difficulty in choosing the right words to express his thoughts.

That is not true. Cooper's voice is soft and seems to lack resonance, but it is a well-bred voice, and his enunciation leaves little to be desired.

It doesn't happen to fit the Gary Cooper myth, but Coop is a mild-mannered, well-educated gentleman—a far cry from the reticent, cow-punching heroes he sometimes depicts. "He may give the appearance of being slow-thinking," says Cecil B. DeMille, "but don't kid yourself. Cooper is as sharp as a razor. Lots of people think all he does is play himself in front of a camera. I've directed the man, and I can tell you that's a lot of bunk. His underplaying is part of his technique. There's nothing natural about it. The man is a great actor, so great, in fact, that he's convinced half the world that he's the same off-screen as he is on."

The depth of his understanding and feeling is evident in the answer he made recently to a reporter who asked him what sort of a child his daughter Maria was.

"It is difficult for me to be objective about my own daughter," Coop began, "but I honestly feel that she is one of the most perceptive and angelic little girls I've ever seen anywhere. I take her out, you know, to restaurants like Chasen's and Romanoff's, and in many ways, it's like having an adult along. Her conversation is intelligent. Her ideas are provocative. Her mother has done a superb job in raising Maria, and the child shows every indication of growing into the wonderful and versatile woman her mother is."

Cooper was born in Helena, Montana. When he was nine, his father, a former British barrister who later became an associate justice of the Montana Supreme Court, sent him to school in Bedfordshire, England.

Young Cooper remained abroad for four years. Classmates who remember him say he was tall, quiet, and moody, and that he used to spin some amazing tales about the wild and woolly west.

One official of the British Foreign Office who remembers Cooper well, says, "In his attitude he seemed to us more British than American. He had a quality of reserve about him. He respected your privacy and expected you to respect his. He was pleasant and sociable but not an easy boy to know. I liked the chap but if anyone had ever predicted that he one day would become a cinema player, I should have said, 'Nonsense!'"

COOPER was 13 when he returned to Montana and enrolled in Bozeman High School. Here he spent most of his time drawing cartoons. He also broke his leg in an automobile accident and was sent to his uncle's cattle ranch to recover.

"While I was at my uncle's place," he recalls, "I discovered that it was much easier to ride than to walk. That's when I began taking a great liking to horses. When my leg healed, I went back to high school."

After graduation, Coop entered Helena Wesleyan College and then transferred to Grinnell College in Iowa, where he spent three and a half years in pre-med school.

After college he returned to Helena where he tried supporting himself as a cartoonist. "Funny thing," he recalls, "the local paper would accept my cartoons and run them over my signature, only they never paid for any."

Presently, Cooper's father resigned from the bench in order to look after the estates some of his relatives had left in Southern California. Coop went south with his father and tried to get some art jobs in Hollywood.

"It was murder," he says. "I took some of my cartoons down to the Los Angeles Times, and the editor said they were terrible. That wasn't exactly the adjective he used. But he left no doubt as to what he thought of my artistic ability."

Cooper's interest in art is still intensive. His home boasts many collectors' items. When he was sick in a New Orleans hospital several months ago, he whiled away the time drawing cartoons, many of which were published in leading newspapers.

He is also an omnivorous reader and, except for his Warner Brothers' commitments, chooses all his story properties. Ernest Hemingway, the novelist, is his great and good friend. They like to hunt and fish together, at which time they discuss life and literature at length.

COOP is also a very smart man with a dollar. He employs no agent to set his business deals but he relies on his own acumen. He has a lawyer, I. H. Prinzmetal, who looks after the many details and contractual obligations, but it's always Gary who makes the decisions.

He earns anywhere from $200,000 per picture and up. Most of his surplus funds are invested in what is known in the stock market as "open-end mutuals" investment trusts.

Gary's father-in-law is Paul Shields, a one-time member of the board of governors on the New York Stock Exchange, and when the actor married his step-daughter, Veronica Balfe, in 1933, Shields advised Cooper to invest his money prudently. Cooper followed the counsel.

As a matter of fact, it was Gary's financial know-how that caused him to abandon cartooning for screen-acting.

When he was earning $10 a day as an extra, and scarcely making both ends meet since he only averaged about two days' work per week, he learned that one star, Tom Mix, was earning $70,000 a month.

"When I found out about Mix earning all that money," Coop says, "I went home and got my drawing boards and sold all my art supplies. I waited until I got $65. Then I hired a cameraman to make a screen test of me. After that, I looked around and got an agent."

"There was a girl working in his office. Nan Collins was her name. We started discussing names one afternoon, and she said, 'A name like Frank Cooper is no good. There are two Frank Coopers in pictures already. We've got to get something new for you.' She finally came up with Gary, and that's how I became Gary Cooper. When Sam Goldwyn hired me for a bit in The Winning Of Barbara Worth, I used my new name for the first time. It's been with me ever since."

Another illustration of Cooper's financial wisdom occurred after his first Paramount contract expired. He was earning $300 a week at the time, and the studio offered to double that sum. When he learned that Paramount was committed to deliver four more Gary Cooper films to the exhibitors, Coop refused the offer. He went hunting for a month, then returned to sign a contract at $1,750 a week. His first job under the new deal was to star opposite Clara Bow in one of the biggest money-makers of the period, It. Which brings us around to the all-important discussion of Gary Cooper and women.

FOR years Cooper has aroused the maternal instinct in women. He seems so unknowing, so shy, so bashful, skittish, and unbending that they want to guide, baby, and mother him.

Before Coop was married, he was the target of practically every eligible girl in Hollywood.

Clara Bow, Lupe Velez, the Countess Di Frasso, and dozens of others all tried to hook him. The tall Westerner actually fell in love with some of these women, but he always realized that while many of them were attractive, witty, and fascinating, none would make a good wife, at least for him—so that when the word "marriage" was mentioned, he ran.

One of the best illustrations of the man's great popularity and enormous latent supply of sex appeal occurred at the premiere of Design For Living, a film in which Coop starred with Miriam Hopkins.

Hundreds of women broke through the ropes around the theatre entrance and began tearing the clothes off Gary's back. It got so bad that two dozen policemen had to rescue the actor from the clutching hands of his clamoring female admirers.

When Coop finally escaped from the mob, he decided that the best thing for him to do was to get married and settle down.

In 1932, at a party given by MGM art director Cedric Gibbons, he was introduced to his host's niece, a girl called Rocky, named Veronica Balfe, who had appeared in a few pictures under the name of Sandra Shaw. They were married a year later, and in 1937, Rocky gave birth to a daughter, Maria.

For 17 long years Gary Cooper was a model husband, and his marriage was one of the most successful in the movie colony.

He taught Rocky how to shoot, and in 1938 she won the California Women's Skeet Championship. She, in turn, taught her husband how to ski, and they bought a ski lodge in Aspen, Colorado.

They moved into a white Georgian home in Brentwood that covers three-and-a-half acres and is beautifully landscaped with gardens, swimming pool, and tennis court. Coop bought a small tractor and cultivated a vegetable and citrus garden, and the pair took to raising chickens and ducks.

It was an idyllic life, combining domesticity with travel and outdoor sports.

What happened to disrupt this paradise?

AFTER 17 years, Cooper, reaching that critical stage in life where a man begins to dread the inevitable passing of his youth, began seeing more and more of Pat Neal, a tall, young, talented actress he had starred opposite in The Fountainhead. Pat is a girl of integrity and insight, and she refused to become the cause of any marital mishap.

When Gary moved out of his house, however, and Rocky officially announced their separation, Pat felt free to date Cooper. As everyone knew she would, she fell hopelessly and completely in love with him. With all her heart she hoped that Coop would resolve the inner struggle that raised itself in his mind—the struggle between returning to Rocky, or divorcing her and starting life anew with Pat.

Cooper, for a while, was beside himself with anguish and indecision. If he divorced Rocky, his beloved daughter, Maria, would become the child of a broken home.

He didn't know what to do. He felt he couldn't give up Pat—and after 17 years, how can one give up a wonderful wife?

It was Pat who had to make the final decision. After all—it was she who was being compromised. If there was no hope of Gary marrying her, what was the sense in seeing him night after night? What was the point in getting more and more involved when the end would be misery?

With great, soul-searing courage, Pat decided. If Cooper had no intention of divorcing his wife, she would refuse to see him. Coop would have to make the choice—he couldn't have his cake and eat it, too.

Coop stalled. He just couldn't break off from Rocky. While he was making Springfield Rifle on location in Lone Palm he would call his wife on the phone, tell her he'd be in for the weekend to take Maria out.

Eventually, Pat Neal realized it was hopeless. She cried her eyes out, packed her bags, refused to see her Hollywood friends, left town, and moved to New York, her heart pretty well shattered.

Coop was broken up for a while—but after a few weeks, instead of reconciling with his wife as everyone predicted, he took up with a girl named Dusty Miller. Before he left for Samoa to star in Return To Paradise, Gary and Dusty were seen everywhere together, especially in the night clubs. Coop seemed to be living every night as if it were his last. No one took their affair seriously, however, least of all Coop who insisted to columnists that he had to do something to while the time away before he left for the South Seas.

Once Paradise was finished, Gary returned to Hollywood—but not to Dusty Miller. He came home to Rocky just in time to escort her to the highly-publicized Marion Davies party. A day later he took off for Idaho to do a little hunting and to decide what to do with the rest of his life.

Right now Gary Cooper is in the midst of making up his mind. It is no easy job. The stakes are high.

(Continued from page 39) comes home dead tired it's another matter. The minute he gets out of his car the two dogs, which weigh in at around eighty pounds each, land on him full force, and ten minutes later when John has beaten his way to the door, he finds a more formidable foe. Russ is standing there with a king-sized grin, and immediately lets his old man have it in the shins. Either this, or pummeling John in the stomach, is Russ's inimitable way of letting his father know he's in for it. And John smiles a tight little smile and tosses Russ up to the ceiling for 30 seconds before he collapses.

Naturally Russell has no clear idea of what a studio is or the meaning of the fact that daddy is an actor. He takes for granted that his father's picture will be in every magazine he picks up and takes great glee in leafing through each one arriving at the house until he has spotted John's face. Any magazine without a picture of Pop isn't worth its salt. What he does understand is that when Daddy is working in a picture he must keep his fingernails and hammers and pistols away from John's face. He learned this the hard way one night when he had been twisting John's ear and his nails left a long scratch across his father's cheek. You might think he had set the house on fire. John jumped up and ran to a mirror, and Patti went over to Russ and explained to him that when Daddy is working he can't get marks on his face because the camera picks them up the next day. This information ran through Russ like a sieve, but he does cooperate to the extent that he now asks if John is working before he clouts him on the nose.

THE reference to his father working in a picture was the one that stopped him. The only pictures he had ever seen were those in magazines or those that John had painted. John used to set up his easel and canvas in the patio, and pretty soon Russ would spot him and crawl under the canvas and stand there watching his father and/or for a chance to get his fingers in the paint. So after a while John gave up painting.

As a matter of fact John is always starting something he doesn't finish. He used to do a lot of sculpting and Russ is fascinated by the assorted unfinished statues around the house. A few have bodies without heads, a few have heads without bodies, and the only completed project is that of an apple. After that, John was bitten by the photography bug and cameras and flashbulbs littered the house for weeks. Then one day two men came to the house. They were from Mexico and John told Russ they were bullfighters and then proceeded to learn all about bull fighting. He read a couple of books and practiced around the house with the cape the matadors had left for him as a souvenir. He got the dogs in the act and put Russ to work with a dish towel, explaining that Russ was to swing out of the way when the dogs ran for the towel. This would have probably been a cinch for Russell, but his old man had to get technical. Bull fighters, said John, stand with their feet together. So he put Russ's feet side by side, and all Russ needed in that position was the wind from the dogs going by. He fell flat on his face and then looked up at his father with an expression that clearly said any fool should know that a boy of two-and-a-half can't balance with his feet close together.

Another day when Russ spotted John swinging the cape around the living room he figured he'd give his old man a good time. "I'm toro," said Russ, who has a faculty of picking up new words.

John beamed. "Okay," he said, "you charge me now."

Russ pounded on the floor with his fists and snorted the way he had seen John do when he was explaining what a bull was. He went straight for the cape, got it wound around his face so that he couldn't see where he was going, and by the time John had whisked it away Russ was headed straight for the edge of a table. Inertia took him right into it and he got a whack on the nose he'll never forget. He looked up at John pretty ruefully but kept his counsel, and since that day has never again joined up in this bull game.

Russ probably knows anyway that it's due to fade any day now. John has met Rito Romero the wrestler and now whenever Russ goes looking for his father he usually finds him in the patio with a couple of muscle men who are tossing each other all over the place. When John gets tired of that he comes in the house and chisels some more on the big piece of driftwood in the living room. This is a project which John hopes to make into a coffee table one of these days. Russ doesn't know which of these days it's going to be because it's been quite a few of them now. John chisels and chisels until he's got a flat top, and then he puts wax in the holes and then he puts some shiny stuff on it and rubs and rubs it. If he's ever satisfied with the way it looks, then he'll have to figure out some way to put legs under it.

Russ ignores his father when work is in progress on the driftwood. It's no fun at all unless he can get into the wax, and that's taboo. He also ignores his parents when they're engaged in a serious discussion. If they're happy and gay he's sure to break it up by shooting everybody involved with his assortment of pistols, but if they're having a disagreement, however slight, he sits down and plays quietly, waiting for it to blow over so that he can get a laugh out of them.

This is one place where Russ shines. He's a natural comedian and never fluffs a chance to get a laugh. The first time John and Patti took him to a drive-in theatre he leaned out of the car window and informed the neighbors that he was Russell Derek. "How do you do?" he said. "I'm Russell Derek. Russell Derek's my name."

"What a ham!" said John, but he and Patti laughed, so now Russ never forgets to do this when they go to a drive-in movie.

For a long time he had his hat act. Russ likes hats and has a whole pile of them, most of which are so big that they come down over his face. The gag was fool-proof until the day John noticed the hats were pushing on Russell's ears and making them stick out. So now when Russ puts on a hat he has to keep it way on top of his head. He can't understand all this fuss about a couple of ears.

Nor has he any comprehension about the stew over the gate that bars the way out of the patio. John never bothered to open it—just leapt over it, and Patti kept 72 telling him he was going to set Russell a bad example, that pretty soon the boy would try to climb over it. So John took to opening and closing it with the dignity of a prime minister when he went through, and Russ feels it's all much ado about nothing. He had the idea to climb over that gate long before he first saw his father jump it, and example or no, he intends trying it as soon as he's big enough.

He's heard them discussing, too, the necessity of John keeping his voice down. "Please don't raise your voice in front of the baby," Patti says, and Russ figures it all as a waste of time. He makes so much noise all by himself that he couldn't hear his father if John used a microphone.

SOMETIMES RUSS just doesn't understand his father. Like the time John took him down to the corral and put him up on Diamond Star's back. Russ likes animals in general and horses in particular, and so

When Edmund Grainger was supervising the filming of The Fabulous Texan, he endeavored to render the smoke signals in the story as authentic as possible by having them supervised by a couple of Arizona Indians.

After they had finished their task, Grainger warmly commended them for the splendid job they did.

"Oh, there was nothing to it," one of the Indians rejoined. "We learned how to do it from the movies."

*Irving Hoffman in

couldn't understand why John was so proud that he wasn't afraid. The toy lizard that John brought home was something else again. Real lizards are okay—they're fun—but this rubber thing bounced around the house as though it had lost its mind, and Russ was terrified lest the thing should land on his head. And John, instead of sympathizing, threw up his hands in bewilderment.

The two are worlds apart in their opinions about toys, too. Russell takes every new toy completely apart in a matter of seconds, figuring nothing's any fun until you know what's inside of it. John, on the other hand, takes the strange attitude that toys are to be kept whole. The only one that's remained that way is the toy monkey he gave Russ last Christmas. They gave him along with it some malarkey about a guy named Santa Claus, but Russ knew quite well his pop had bought it for him because of the special glow on his face when Russ opened it. As a matter of courtesy Russ has left the monkey intact, but the suspense is killing him and one day he'll get to the inside of that thing.

John goes along with him unless and until the going gets too rough, and then starts the discipline. Or at least John's own brand with Russ, which consists of one, maybe two whacks. It stops there because, as John tells Patti, Russ isn't the same boy when he's being punished that he was when he was stuffing hamburger into his mouth with his hands. That calls for a whack, sure, but the minute Russ turns on the tears John melts like an iceberg in the Caribbean. He has even said, in Russ's presence, that his son's face gets him, that he looks like an angel the minute he's done something wrong. Russ wasn't born yesterday and knows full well that all he has to do is squeeze the tears and the spanking ceases.

He knows his father is a big man. He's seen him stick on a spooky horse and heard him outpoint friends in an argument. But let something happen to Russ, and John is as effective as a paper cup in the Pacific. Like the day Patti took Russ for his first haircut and drove him home in the sun with the top down. The heat got him and by the time he got home he passed out, with a temperature of 103. When he came to, John was rifling through the telephone directory and frantically calling one doctor after another. No one could come right away, but by the time one did arrive over an hour later, Russ's fever had disappeared and he was chewing happily on John's pants leg. Russ thinks John's face can change from May to December faster than anybody's you ever saw.

BUT always Russ knows that John is on his side, even if the old man does overdo this protective stuff a little bit. They're great pals these days and Russ tries to do everything John does. This includes swimming, which he does quite well for his years. The only trouble is that just as he's beginning to have a good time, John decides Russ had better get dressed before he catches cold. And when John himself has a cold he won't let Russ near him. "Don't touch Daddy," he says. Russ thinks it's pretty silly because he never catches a cold. He can't remember when he's been sick, yet his old man is forever watching over him.

John and Patti consider Russ to be a rather well behaved boy on the whole, and quite obedient. They keep wondering aloud, in front of him, whether it's because of their training or his own good nature. Russ can't figure how they know he's good. If he had a brother or sister they'd have some way of comparing him, but this way, he tells himself happily, he has the whole ship to himself. He knows the answer, though. He minds because he doesn't make out so well if he doesn't. At first he tried ignoring it when John called him to come to him, but even though John's spankings are short lived, he has a pretty heavy hand. So with simple logic, Russ comes.

John has given up the spankings almost entirely by now. He doesn't enjoy them—even Russ knows that—and he's taken to lecturing instead. If Russ mugs it up a little and looks real interested in what his old man is saying, John is sometimes good for a lollipop or two. So Russ stands there looking very serious and listens for a while and then he says, "Okay, okay, okay," and that always breaks up John, who forgets to finish the lecture.

In the hours without lectures, Russ enjoys tremendously his relationship with his father. He seems to sense already that he is lucky to have a pop who likes all kinds of sports and who one day will be able to teach him a great deal about these things. And when John goes away on business, Russ is crushed. The house seems so big and so empty and quiet.

JOHN'S trips are almost always made by plane, and Russ is taken to the airport to wave goodbye to John. But the other morning when Russ got to the breakfast table and missed John, he looked puzzled and said, "Where's Daddy?"

"Your father's gone away, down to Mexico to see a bull fight," said Patti.

"Silly boy," said Russ. "He didn't go away. I didn't wave at the plane."

"But he went in the car," explained Patti, and Russ looked at her coolly and shook his head. "Nope," he said. "No plane. You're hiding him somewhere."

He was really unhappy about that one. It's bad enough to have the old man gone, but to have him sneak away or what's worse, hide for two days, was more than Russ could take. He wasn't truly happy again until John came home and he could fly out from behind the door and butt the big character in the stomach.

(John Derek will soon be seen in Columbia's Prince Of Pirates.)

He forgave her, of course. In fact at the end of the production, Negulesco formally presented her with a tin lunch box. But her reputation as a practical joker was so firmly established at this point that the publicity department had little to do but embellish it from time to time with more samples of Gaynor gags that may or may not have happened.

And here's where the real practical joke sets in. It's a strange thing, but occasionally an actress is given a build-up which seemingly fits her personality. Then a crisis occurs in her private life, and the build-up looms false, incongruous, out of character. So it was with Mitzi Gaynor.

Coincidental with the establishment of Mitzi's effervescent sense of humor came the announcement that this delightful, dancing pixie was ecstatically in love with a handsome, prematurely gray young lawyer named Richard Coyle.

This love affair, which was Mitzi's first, began when she was 16. It lasted five years. It was supposed to culminate in marriage on September 4th, 1952 when Mitzi was 21. It culminated in nothingness. A few weeks ago Mitzi and Dick Coyle had one of those momentous heart-to-heart talks which usually prefaces the breakup of any engagement.

The talk took place in the old-fashioned Hollywood Hills home where Mitzi and her mother lived on the second floor and Dick and his mother lived on the first.

Mitzi had made her decision the week before, and because she is honest and straightforward and has always respected her former fiancé for his intellect and integrity, she made it short and sweet.

"I'm sorry," she said, removing the diamond engagement ring, "I can't wear this any longer."

Dick Coyle said nothing for a moment, just stood there gulping, looking into the sad brown eyes of the talented beauty who had been christened Francesca Mitzi Marlene de Chenzy von Gerber.

A few days later the Coyles, mother and son, moved out of the home they had jointly occupied with the Gerbers, mother and daughter. Thus finis was written to a Cinderella romance which even jaded Hollywood had accorded the destiny of a happy ending.

AFTER five long years of loving, hoping, working, waiting, and planning, why did Mitzi Gaynor break her engagement to Richard Coyle?

The 31-year-old attorney when asked to comment on the breakup, merely said, "It's a personal thing, and I don't want to talk about it."

Mitzi herself says in her usual, jaunty, bouncing style, "These things happen. A girl just decides that marriage to a certain man wouldn't be right for her; so she just doesn't marry that certain man."

Mrs. Pauline Gerber, Mitzi's mother, who knows something about heartache—she left her husband back in Detroit when she and her only child came west to try their luck—is of the opinion, "that it is best to forget about that affair. There's no point in re-hashing it. Mitzi is only 21. She has yet to reach the peak of her career, and there's plenty of time for marriage."

All of these quotations beg the question. None of them answers it. According to intimates the reason Mitzi Gaynor isn't Mrs. Richard Coyle today is that she has fallen for a famous studio executive.

Whether Mitzi Gaynor cares deeply for this man, more than twice her age, whether anything, professional or non professional, emerges from this acquaintance-ship, it definitely proves one thing: When a 16-year-old girl tells the world that she is a "one-man-gal" and that "I have found the man in life for me," it may be regarded as the delightfully romantic, but often false notion of any young girl, immature and tender of heart. Mitzi is now old enough to realize she wants her fling. She isn't ready to settle down with any one young man no matter how brilliant, amusing, or educated.

When Mitzi Gaynor was 16 she was dancing in Naughty Marietta at the Los Angeles Civic Light Opera. One night backstage she caught a glimpse of a tall, handsome young man talking to Edward Everett Horton. The tall young man caught a glimpse of her, too. The glimpse became a stare.

"A funny thing," Mitzi has said. "I knew I'd just have to meet him. I asked Horton to introduce me. As a gag he wouldn't, but he did tell me that the fellow's name was Richard Coyle and that he was a fraternity brother of his, and that he'd just graduated from law school at Northwestern."

That's how it started, with a strong rapport of physical attraction between Mitzi Gaynor and Richard Coyle.

People have since wondered how a mature, settled, quiet, well-educated young man like Coyle could fall for a scatterbrain like Mitzi.

The truth is that there is little logic or reasonableness in love. Coyle recognized great potential in Mitzi, and when she reached her 17th birthday—they had met and dated several times previously—he gave her a gold band, a ring she prefers to call "a friendship ring."

The important factor to remember in this love affair was the relative obscurity of the participants. Practically no one had ever heard of Richard Coyle in California, and Mitzi Gerber (the name she went by before Fox changed it) was, in the year 1947, a dancer who had worked in several shows put on by Edgar Lester: The Fortune Teller, Song Of Norway, Louisiana Purchase, and Naughty Marietta. This was no love affair between a star-struck youth and a well-known dancer.

Dick and Mitzi were just a pair of kids in love, so much in love that one night Mitzi came to her mother and said, "Dick and I want to get married."

Looking back on it now Mitzi says, "Mother didn't exactly blow her top. She's much too sensible for that. But she pointed out other entertainers who had married at an early age, Shirley Temple, Lana Turner, Judy Garland. I knew what had happened to their first marriages, so when she suggested that we wait until I reached 21, I objected of course, but in my heart I felt she was right."

"After all, I wasn't anywhere yet in my career and neither was Dick. He was just starting out as a lawyer. How would we support ourselves? When you're very young and very much in love, I don't guess you worry about such down-to-earth things."

MITZI's big break came not long after she had been graduated from the School for Professional Children run by Mala Powers' mother. George Jessel, the ex-20th Century-Fox producer who still refers to her as "Morris," caught Mitzi playing the part of a gold-digging ballerina in The Great Waltz. It was during this operetta that Mitzi showed her great stage presence. While she was dancing her petticoat slipped down. Very casually Mitzi stepped out of it and continued waltzing with Walter Slezak.

George Jessel says now, "When I first caught Morris up there on the stage, I said to myself, 'This kid is worth a test.' I asked her to come out to the studio and she sang 'I'm In Love With A Wonderful Guy' while the cameras rolled. I thought she was singing the song for me, but now she says it was this guy Coyle she had in mind. Whoever it was, she did a great job. We signed her to a one-picture deal at a grand a week. When Zanuck saw the rushes he gave her the usual seven-year contract at the same figure. I wanted to change her name into something pretty glamorous, but she insisted on keeping the Mitzi and the same last initial, so we came up with Gaynor."

What was her fiancé Richard Coyle doing while Mitzi was earning her $1,000 a week? Working in a downtown insurance office during the day and studying for his bar exams during the night. He decided presently that it was more prudent of him to return to Chicago where he'd been offered a better-paying job.

Starring in musicals is the hardest picture-making there is. Mitzi found that out when she reported for work on the set of My Blue Heaven—but the months of arduous study and rehearsal were good for the slant-eyed madcap because they tired her physically and she hardly had enough strength left to worry about her Dickie-boy in Chicago. Only it was known all around Hollywood that Mitzi Gaynor was engaged, and none of the local wolves tried to move in. It wouldn't have helped them anyway.

"I'm a one-man-gal," Mitzi used to say. "and I have been since I met Richard. Maybe it's corny to believe in love at first sight, but that's what happened to me."

When Richard returned from Chicago he and his mother moved into the Gerber residence, which, even for Hollywood, is a most unique move. The columnists of course quickly came to the conclusion that Dick and Mitzi had eloped somewhere and had been secretly married.

I remember I once asked Mitzi while she was making Take Care Of My Little Girl if she hadn't eloped to Las Vegas. "Look, Cuz," she said (Cuz is the moniker she reserves for people whose names she doesn't know or remember) "when I get married it won't be an elopement. We'll do it up right, in a church with all the trimmings." Her eyes shone with dreams. "When do you think that'll be?" I asked. Mitzi grinned. "Around my 21st birthday."

When I mentioned that conversation to an agent-friend of mine, he laughed and came up with a prophecy which has turned out to be the truth.

"That girl ain't marrying anybody for a long time," he said.

"Don't be silly," I answered. "She's getting married in September. Told me so herself."

THE agent regarded me with amused tolerance. "I know that little chick," he began, "and she's career-crazy. To her, her career comes first. Don't you know she's been dancing since the age of four? Her aunt on her mother's side was a concert ballet dancer. All her life this kid has been trained for stardom. I used to see her mother around town when they first came here from Detroit. She used to make the studio rounds with Mitzi trying to get the kid a break. The mother is a frustrated actress. She's living her life vicariously through Mitzi."

"Mitzi's got the same sense of values as her mother. You think she's going to give up what she has now to get married to this lawyer?"

"I may be talking through my hat, but this kid, as cute and smart as she is—well, she's career-driven, and I'll give you five-to-one that come September she stays married to 20th Century-Fox. Mitzi is heading for the big-time, and she'll let some big-time guy help her, but you can bet your last doughnut that there isn't a guy alive today who's going to slow her down."

"Mind you, I'm not knocking the kid. I think she's wonderful, really talented; I caught some of the rushes of The I Don't Care Girl, and she's swell; but, like I say, she'd have to have rocks in her head to give it all up for marriage. I don't think she will."

In retrospect the agent was right, and practically all the rest of Hollywood wrong. People who know Mitzi well say she made a sad mistake in going steadily with one man.

A girl who attended Mme. Katherine

Etienne's ballet school with the dancer, told me, "Mitzi loves a variety of things. She has a restless nature. Every girl should use her adolescent years as a time for experiment, a time for dating. That's the only way you get to know about men. They say boys need a fling as part of their education. The husband who marries early usually kicks over the traces. Isn't that what happened to Kirk Douglas? In a way I think that's what happened to Mitzi."

"Outside of a few schoolgirl crushes she never dated anyone but Dick Coyle. When you're very young the way she was, you start out being infatuated with a fellow. If after a year or two you don't get married the infatuation cools off. It's the same with most marriages. I think if Mitzi really wanted to marry Richard she could have done so last year when she was 20. After all the age of consent in California is 18."

"Actually it's a good thing that she's decided to play around a little. The more she sees of other men, especially in Hollywood, the more she'll realize what a wonderful guy she had in Dick Coyle. I've heard all those rumors about Mitzi and her V. I. P. and while he's a very influential man and can help any actress a great deal—let's face it, he doesn't happen to be the marrying kind. Of course, if Mitzi doesn't want to get married, she can play the field. But playing the field isn't very rewarding. By the time you decide on one certain guy, you usually discover that he's married to somebody else."

MITZI's mother feels that an actress can have both a career and marriage—and quite a few actresses, Susan Hayward, June Allyson, Jane Powell, and Jeanne Crain—have all managed to pull the trick. Right now, however, Mitzi is concentrating on her career and if there is some other man who has the inside track on her heart, she is keeping his identity hidden.

The girl who, according to all the publicity handouts, is supposed to gush like a severed artery, cracking jokes left and right, ready with a quip at the slightest provocation, says very little these days.

Has a new love got your tongue, Mitzi?

heartbreak ahead?

(Continued from page 52) feeling that everyone has been waiting for her third marriage to blow sky-high. And it's true. No one expects the Gardner-Sinatra marriage to last. Even as you read these very lines, it may be finished either temporarily or for good.

However, for Ava it won't be all play. If everything goes according to her planned schedule the actress will remain outside the U.S. at least 18 months. She will do Mogambo, a remake of the original Jean Harlow film titled Red Dust, opposite Clark Gable in Africa. This picture will be finished by March, 1953.

Then she will fly to Paris or London to star in a film tentatively titled The House On Humility Street. Ava will portray a night club singer in Paris who falls tempestuously in love with a young American who is preparing for the priesthood. This production should be finished by the end of 1953.

The second Mrs. Sinatra will then make a third picture abroad; neither she nor the studio knows what it will be.

After a dozen years in the movie colony of spasmodic work at salaries ranging from $250 to $1,250 a week, Ava, because of taxes and mounting expenses, has practically no money in the bank. Moreover, she has been 74 exceedingly unhappy in her relationship with MGM—L. B. Mayer, former production chief at the studio, was furious with her for going around with Frank Sinatra—and she was determined not to re-sign with that organization.

However, when she was offered 18 months abroad, a fat boost in salary, and a chance to keep most of it, she forgot her "mad" and signed the new deal. It was rumored that she wanted a clause in her contract permitting her to star in at least one picture with Frank Sinatra, and while the matter was broached, MGM refused to entertain any such thought.

It wasn't only the pot of gold that made Ava Gardner decide to try to reach the other end of the rainbow. This "change of scene" may be just what the doctor ordered for Mrs. Sinatra's marital ills. Her union with Frank is unhealthy. It's heading toward an early demise. The symptoms are all there, everybody recognizes them. Everybody discusses them.

Ava knows this and it nettles her. In the year that she and Frank have been married they've bickered, fought, and quarreled all over the town. Generally Ava is an honest, frank-talking girl, but when reporters questioned her about these fights she denied them and, on one occasion, she bitterly berated one of the best writer friends she has in Hollywood because he printed a truthful approximation of her marital status with Frank.

When you quarrel in public, when your husband goes on location with you as Frank did with Ava when she made Vaquero in Utah, it is a physical impossibility to keep these battles a secret. People see and people will talk.

Why do Ava and Frank fight so much?

The answer is that Ava is basically a shy, insecure, fear-ridden, intelligent young woman who knows that for many years the man to whom she is now married was regarded as a Casanova of the 20th century.

Having spent a good deal of time with Artie Shaw, Ava knows what life is like for a crooner like Frankie on the road. She knows that when he plays New York, a small army of females thrives in that town any member of which would love to get her lips on her man. She knows that Sinatra, has, when he wants to use it, great charm, warmth, and good nature. In the mood, Frank can charm the fangs out of a snake.

As a singer he may have passed his prime, but as a man he is still virile, attractive, and particularly appealing to the type of girl who follows bands and singers. Jealousy has frequently been defined as that intangible which sits up with a wife when her husband is out late. Ava is not particularly jealous—it is impossible for anyone to have been married to such husbands as Mickey Rooney and Artie Shaw without developing an awareness of the foibles inherent in man—it is rather that she is fearful, afraid that her marriage to Frank will inevitably come apart at the seams.

When Frank is away from her, and in the year of their marriage he's been working out of town in New York, Lake Tahoe, New Jersey, Chicago—wherever he could pick up a buck—Ava has been bedeviled by thoughts which give her no peace. She wonders what Frank is doing when he isn't working; her imagination begins to play tricks on her, and she cannot sleep.

It is no exaggeration to say that at the time she left for Africa she had developed a beautiful case of insomnia for herself. She couldn't go to bed until she was utterly exhausted and worried out, usually by 4:00 or 4:30 in the morning; and she would sleep a restless, troubled sleep until 1:00 or 2:00 in the afternoon. Worse yet, her appetite fell off, and she became so thin that at such formal functions as the Marion Davies party she could not afford to wear a strapless gown, so much had the wherewithal to hold it up diminished.

Whether Ava has had any grounds to worry about Frank is beside the point. The fact is that she thinks she has, and for a year she's worried herself sick. In September when Frank was playing the Riviera in Jersey, Ava came to New York and stayed with him at the Hampshire House. One evening after a long dragged-out verbal battle in which she accused the thin man of behavior not on par with her expectations, Ava returned to their suite. Frank had gone to Jersey, and inwardly she was seething. She took off her wedding ring, wrote him a short but blistering farewell note, left the ring over which they both had taken their marriage vows, on top of the note, packed her bags, and returned to the Coldwater Canyon house they used to rent in Beverly Hills.

When Frank got back to the hotel the following morning he was flabbergasted. Regardless of his behavior he loves Ava more than he has ever loved any other woman, and when he read her farewell note, it seemed to him as if the bottom had dropped out of everything. "She can't do this," he kept saying to himself.

His first impulse was to race to La Guardia, catch a plane, and follow Ava home. Then he realized he was booked into the Hotel Chase in St. Louis in a few days, and if he cancelled out he would be sued for the small fortune he doesn't have.

He put the marriage ring Ava had left into his pocket, waited until the next day, then placed a long distance phone call to Beverly Hills. Eventually Ava came to the phone. The newlyweds spoke and quarreled. The same old story . . . Do you promise? Yes, I promise. I've heard that one before . . . and on ad infinitum.

PRESENTLY Frank discovered that he'd lost Ava's wedding ring. He ordered a duplicate. In Hollywood, however, Ava confided to friends that she and Frank were approaching the end of the trail. She couldn't care less, she asserted, if he cancelled plans to accompany her to Africa and Europe. She was taking her inoculations for scarlet fever, cholera, smallpox, and a flock of tropical diseases, and she didn't care what he did. This of course was merely so much venting of the spleen. Ava cared a good deal. She drove down to the Palm Springs house, the only home the Sinatras really own, and when Frank phoned from St. Louis, she was a little more amenable to his proposals for a truce.

Frank said he'd be home in a week or two, and Ava said she was going to the Marion Davies party with Lana Turner and Fernando Lamas. A few days later, she added, she and Lana were going down to Tijuana for the bull fights. Carlos Arruza, the great Mexican matador, was fighting, and she didn't want to miss him.

Frank allowed as he might be able to make the bullfights with her. This was the peace prelude.

When he was finished with his Hotel Chase engagement, the crooner flew home. A day later he and Ava had made up. Frank had been reinstated in his wife's good graces. She told him about the fight Lana and Lamas had engaged in at the Davies party and explained that Lana would attend the bullfights with Benny Cole.

Benny is a former business manager for Artie Shaw who now works as a business manager for two of Artie's ex-wives, Lana and Ava. He is a very indulgent young man and specializes in what he calls "personal service." He runs errands for his clients, accompanies Lana to Lake Tahoe, carries messages for the girls to and from MGM, even acts as their escort when escorts are scarce.

When the bullfights at Tijuana were over on October 12th, and some 5,000 people in the audience had seen Frank squeezed like a sardine between Ava and Lana, the news was quickly flashed that Ava and Frank had effected another reconciliation—no one knew or cared exactly which reconciliation this was, the tenth or the twentieth—and that both of them would leave for Africa together.

A few days later I ran into them at Frascatis, a restaurant in Beverly Hills. "You going overseas with Ava?" I asked the singer.

"You bet," he said.

"Going to do any work over there?"

"I think so," Frank said. He explained that there were many theatres in Africa, particularly in South Africa where he might entertain, but that more than anything else he didn't want to get too far away from Ava. That's what most of their trouble had been about in this country, being separated because of the circumstances of their respective careers.

Ava pointed out that some of Mogambo would be shot in England and that Frank had always been extremely popular at the Palladium in London and could undoubtedly find bookings there. They both seemed as happy as I've ever seen them.

Just how long that happiness will last I don't know. I do know, however, that Ava was happy to get away from Hollywood. This town has given her a strange kind of guilt complex.

I remember a few months ago when Frank was singing at the Coconut Grove in Los Angeles. Ava had dyed her hair blonde and used to come to the hotel for the first show to give her man every possible support on his comeback trail. Midway during his performance, Frank would turn to the audience and ask for requests.

One night a particularly obnoxious red-head jumped to her feet. When Frank offered to sing any of the many songs he'd made famous, this "beaut" shouted, "Sing 'Nancy'! Sing 'Nancy'! We want 'Nancy'!" ("Nancy" is the title of a love ballad dedicated to Frank's first wife.)

At that moment I looked across the room at Ava. She was sitting with Frank's manager, Hank Sanicola. Her white complexion was an uncomfortably unbecoming shade of red.

OVERSEAS Ava Gardner Sinatra is sure such embarrassments won't occur. She hopes she's said goodbye to this kind of heartache. Which is one reason she's glad she went. The other, and much less important, is the money. Money has never been the prime consideration in Ava Gardner's life. "I never had any to begin with," she once said, "and I don't expect I'll have any at the end."

The last thing she wants to do in the world is to have to admit the same thing of happiness with Frank Sinatra.

As they roared away, Bob noticed his boys, Jim and Chris, wide awake and wider eyed.

"What's the big attraction?" Jim asked. "Sounded like dames. Was it?"

"It was," panted Bob. "Nuttty dames They think I'm a movie star."

"Well," countered Jim, "aren't you?"

"That's what some people claim back in Hollywood," answered Bob. "But I never believed that, do you?"

"Naw—not if you say so."

"Attaboy," his pop. patted him. "Now get back to sleep."

Bob Mitchum was running away from Hollywood—shaking the glamor-dust from his kicks as he's done before when it got too thick for comfort. At that get-away point, he didn't want to be reminded of a status which, for reasons peculiar to Robert Charles Mitchum, he is forced periodically to assure himself and everyone close to him ain't necessarily so—even though it so obviously is.

"This Hollywood star stuff—it's still not for real. I'm just in on a pass. I'm like a guest in the house. Soon—I'll be traveling on. I'm not a big Hollywood star, and I'm not terribly interested in being one. I haven't enhanced my position much socially or financially. Sure—I've got a house with a mortgage—a wonderful wife and three wonderful kids, a '48 Buick and this knockout heap. But I get little benefit or satisfaction out of being a freak. I've been one for eight years. Ten years is long enough for a guy to stick at any job, isn't it? I'm just sweating out the next two years on my contract and hoping to do one good job. Then—here we go again!"

You might call that the home-again blues. Or the get-away blues. Or the Mitchum melancholies. Whatever the tag, they're what seizes Bob Mitchum whenever he's had a footloose look at the world outside Hollywood, when the pressure builds up and he itches to be on his way. It's a chronic affliction with as misunderstood a character as has ever landed on Hollywood's golden shores, but who found the elusive gold he's juggled there not the kind of stuff he was chasing at the end of the rainbow wheels which is built on a Ford truck.

After that upsetting incident, the Oochapap rolled on—farther and farther away from Hollywood—over Colorado's Rockies and across Oklahoma's plains. Through the piney woods of Arkansas, the cypress swamps and along the bayous of Mississippi and Louisiana. Along the way, the gear inside Bob's ramble wagon got a thorough workout as Mitch and his boys stopped and camped where they pleased, fished, hunted, swam, explored and chinned with the characters they met.

IN New Orleans, his wife, Dorothy, joined the gang and they headquartered at their pal, Frank Monteleone's hotel in the Old Quarter of the Mitchums' favorite city, where time goes back a couple of hundred years. They roamed up and down the narrow streets with their filigreed iron balconies, along Bourbon and Royal, and listened to the throbbing Basin Street jazz Mitch loves. They ate shrimps Creole and drank Sazeracs, exploring the intimate ante-bellum charms of the Old Absinthe House, the Vieux Carée, the Famous Door, the LaFitte Bar. When that palled, the Mitchums rolled along the Gulf Coast to Biloxi and Pass Christian where Frank Monteleone and his wife, Isabel, had a big log house up beside a bayou under ancient moss-draped oaks and a boat right in the front yard. Bob chugged out on the Gulf, ran into a line squall that almost you're starting a picture." So the Mitchums flew home and Tim Wallace drove the Oochapap back. The pipe dream was ended, but not forgotten. Despite a three-month hiatus from Hollywood footloose and free, roaming and rambling, the gnawing, dissatisfied restlessness remains in Bob Mitchum's big chest—and fortunately or unfortunately for him—I'm pretty sure it always will.

I dropped in on the Mitchums a week after they got home this fall. Bob was still wearing his red-checked hunting shirt and his travel-soiled jeans. The picture job that spelled sudden death to his holiday still hadn't started then, and Bob was pacing restlessly around the big pine-paneled living room of his Mandeville Canyon place. Phones jangled constantly and sometimes Bob answered them. Sometimes he just growled, "I left yesterday," and prowled outside to where the Oochapap was parked, still crammed with the outdoor junk, as if straining at the leash to haul Mitch out on the open road again. On the lawn stretched his canvas boat, looking lonesome and thirsty for water. Bob came back in the house, sprawled on a long, leather sofa built to handle his outsized frame, reached for a shotgun and started polishing it with an oiled rag.

His wife, Dorothy, who has the softest brown eyes of any girl in Hollywood, sat in a club chair knitting. A fire crackled in the big fireplace. Pretty soon Dot's mother, Ina, brought in a fat, blue-eyed bundle—Petrina, Bob's new daughter, the prettiest, healthiest baby girl you ever saw and one you'd never guess almost died when she was born last winter. Bob bounced her on his knees, made faces and got faces back, called her "Baldy" then brought her a drink of warm milk to apologize. Chris, wearing a grin under a cocky, once white sailor hat romped in from school reminding his dad that the paper drive was coming up at Santa Monica Canyon school, also a PTA meeting, and don't forget the Cub Scout picnic. "You're in," grinned Bob, "I'll be there." Chris vanished into the study to practice his piano lesson, and about then Jimmy called from Harvard Military Academy. He'd just cracked his jaw playing football, he reported, and by the way, he wouldn't be home that week—yeah, he confessed, still working off demerits

*HOLLYWOOD MERRY-GO-ROUND

• One movie director—Arch Oboler of radio fame—likes to refer to himself in third person. Production was lagging but Oboler insisted on doing a scene over "I don't believe Oboler likes that scene the way it is now," he said.

Digustedly, his unhappy producer remarked, "When he comes in, I'll tell him."

swamped the thing, had his arm halt yanked off by scrappy tarpon. He went into the bayou country angling for "green trout," the big Mississippi bass that grow as fat as whisky jugs; banged away at alligators in the swamps with his rifle, and on some lazy days just lounged around in the mossy shade with Dorothy and his hosts, nursing a tall, cool one. Hollywood seemed a million miles away and even more unimportant to a joker who never figured it was important to him, anyway.

After that the Oochapap (a Cajun word for practically anything) pushed on across Texas where everybody seemed to have a few million dollars, everybody wanted to toss a party for Bob and Dorothy and nobody could understand him when he said, at last, "I've got to get back to work."

"Work?" drawled one lady sadly, when she heard that excuse "Why, he's such a nice boy—does he have to work? My husband," she sighed, "had to work once—poor man."

But Bob knew what was coming. Hollywood caught up with him in Texas. He opened The Lusty Men in Dallas, and in Kilgore at his friend Judge McGee's house. The wife came. "Take the next plane home.

You'd have never guessed, witnessing that cozy domestic scene, that Bob Mitchum could ever want or need anything more than what was around him. That is, until you saw Bob jump out of his chair, burst through the door and stare up at the sky. A thin, wavering line in V-formation was heading south. Geese. How Bob heard their beckoning honks above all the family noises, I'll never know, unless his ears are tuned that way.

"Guess I'm just a bum at heart," allowed Bob cheerfully, in line with his thoughts. "Been chasing rainbows all my life and suppose I always will. People who try to make me a solid citizen today," he grinned, "are just 20 years too late. I've got the itch and I've always had it. Not," he added, "that I don't appreciate the luck I've had. Not many guys have such a break; mighty few are privileged to experience all this here in Hollywood. It's great. But it can't be forever."

"People," he continued, "are always saying to me, 'Watch it, boy. Play it safe. Be careful!' But that chokes me off. What for? Being careful's not living—that's for the cemetery. But saying 'What's next?' is. I've never really had a rough moment in all my life—not one. And I've been backed up against box car walls with a knife in my ribs, slugged it out on top a hi-balling freight where it was the other guy or me RIGHT now Robert Mitchum's salary is $200,000 a year. He's the mainstay and the work horse, too, of RKO studios, the boy they call on when the going looks rough for a script or a picture. In the year before he took off for his rambling "rest leave" he ground out five. The best, The Lusty Men, was his own idea which he helped cast and helped write. In between, he raced off for vain bursts of freedom, trying to avoid what happened once when he was making two pictures at MGM and another at RKO simultaneously. After working 19 straight days and 19 straight nights he went berserk, kicked an $18,000 camera into a water tank, tore up the wardrobe department, demolished a set and insulted several dignified stars. But until last July each time Bob shook himself loose from Hollywood, they yanked him right back.

"I've been dying for dear old RKO a year and a half and now I'm dead—all flaked out," he told his bosses last July. "Goodbye, boys, I'm through." Small wonder Bob was in no mood for the movie star treatment that night up in Idaho after he'd finally fled Hollywood in the "Oochapap" as he calls his house or —and it wasn't me. I've scampered away in the night like a rabbit. I've been hungry and cold and busted flat. I've been in clover and I've been in jail. But I've loved every minute of it. Some people around here," puzzled Bob, "can't understand that."

They certainly can't. A town that collects ulcers piling up annuities and worrying about a secure old age can't really understand a life-lusty guy like Bob Mitchum banking only on his crowded pocket full of dreams. They've tagged him a bum, and a wild Indian, by accepted lights, a screwball and a crazy character—and Bob would be the last one to say them nay. It wouldn't be worth all the cheap conversations involved. He wouldn't convince anybody anyway; and he doesn't need to convince the people who count with Mitch, which includes himself, his wife, his family and a flock of widely scattered friends who like him for what he is. And what Bob Mitchum is—bone, body, blood, heart and spirit—stems far away from Hollywood and goes back a good many years. In fact, around 300 years.

It was in the 1640's that a rugged band of settlers named Mitchum came to the Santee River swamplands in South Carolina with a land grant from the King of England. They were among the very first Carolinians, right along with the Davises, Gambles and Dukes. Only they weren't such a solid citizen type. They had a curious habit of wanting to know what was over the next hill. So a lot of them pushed up into the wilderness of Ohio, across into Tennessee, down through the palmettos to the Floridas, up the coast to Jersey and beyond. A couple of the more adventurous traveled with Lewis and Clark on the great Expedition to the Northwest and they brought back Blackfoot Indian brides, a shocker in those days to the local settlers. They got socially ostracized more or less for that, but they weren't conventional so it didn't bother them too much. From that branch descended Robert Mitchum—that's his right name—and he's one of the breed, an eighth Blackfoot himself. "I'm from the low-down Mitchum line," Bob will grin, "but I'm kind of proud of it. They didn't believe in rules, my ancestors, and they didn't give a damn. And every one of them could look after himself wherever he went, which was often a pretty far piece."

Bob himself grew up mainly around Bridgeport, Connecticut, but he spent a lot of time on the farm of his grandmaw (who died just this year) down in Delaware, and from the start he was a Mitchum, through and through. When he was only four years old he tore off alone, the sights for to see. They caught him, but he'd traveled 15 miles to Milford before they did, which is pretty good going for a four-year-old. He kept trying, until the cops got sick and tired of dragging him home. Sometimes he'd land in the pokey—as he did when he was only 12 on a vagrancy charge. At which time the vagabond muse in the boy Mitchum erupted with this fragmentary poem, expressing his rainbow-chasing urge, his frustrations, and his kid search for an answer. He wrote it and his mother, who worked for the Bridgeport Post, got it printed, because it sounded like her boy, Bob: "I seek adventure and I find it too much penned Bob).

"Oh if I were only rich!
"I'd not be in this terrible 'dutch,'
"I'd not be in this ditch."

Bob Mitchum's struggle all his life has been to keep out of ditches—some people all them ruts—and the struggle undoubtedly has landed him in various ditches. Whether being rich would have helped much is questionable, and Bob himself knows that. He's never been a nickel-nurser and never will be. I asked him once what big charge he'd get out of important money if he ever did find himself rolling in the stuff. "Giving it away would be my kick," he replied promptly.

Bob sees his Hollywood colleagues all around him, earning no more money than himself, collecting oil wells and business blocks and piling up estates for the probate courts some day. He doesn't dig it. If the oil wells walked right into his front yard that would be fine, but he's not holding his breath until they do. "I'm a loser with dough, not a winner," he believes. "I've never made a profit on anything in my life. But that never made a wrinkle."

Bob has always been one of the softest touches in Hollywood. People take advantage of him, out-fox him in business, tap him like a beer barrel. He knows it but doesn't resent it. In his Hollywood career, he figures he's been knocked over for around $80,000. "Which sometimes dims my faith in my fellow man," he chuckles, "but not for very long."

REALLY, faith and interest in his fellow man is the meat and drink of Bob Mitchum's soul. Mitch likes people—not just the right people—but all kinds of people. Humanity has been his prime hobby ever since he could knock around among people and learn what made them tick. Without going into Bob's life saga, I might point out that in his early checked career he's bummed through all the 48 states in the Union as a hobo, rail-roader, a carnival roustabout. He's tooted a sax, promoted a barnstorming astrologer, written night club skits, sold shoes, worked in service stations, factories, stores and on amusement pikes. He's dug ditches, peddled house-to-house. He's buddied with bums and with millionaires too. He knows the plush side and the seamy side as well. All of it fascinates him and still does. Maybe that's why when high-priced, artistic, Hollywood-bound script writers get stuck they call on Mitch to straighten them out. He's doctored half the scripts he's played in. As an actor he's no Barrymore, but he knows ten times more about all kinds of characters than most actors ever know.

The kind of pals Bob Mitchum cottons to, and always has, are the interesting characters—the genuine, the colorful, and the mavericks, even as himself. They may have millions or barely a bean—it makes no never mind with Mitch. He can take up—as he and Dorothy did—with "Francine, the Village queen," a night club entertainer at the Fiesta Club in Biloxi, Mississippi, and be as firm a friend as he also could with respectable Judge McGee, the Kilgore, Texas, lawyer who handles oil empires. He can chin with a bartender on Bourbon Street and swap valued observations, just as he can argue with a dough-heavy Texas oil tycoon who told him when debate waxed warm, "You have an opinion? Well, I have 53 million dollars!"

Bob's Bohemian taste for off-beat individuals has landed him in trouble a time or two and that's also handed him the reputation of a reckless brawling rounder. A body built for the prize ring, a devil-may-care map and manner, his knockabout past—and a few sensational incidents—have contributed to the dangerous legend that Bob would just as soon flatten you to the floor as look at you. The truth is that his funnybone is as much overdeveloped as his punching muscles and gets twice the exercise, wherever he roams.

ACTUALLY, Bob Mitchum is too wrapped up in the people he meets to go around mowing them down, and that attraction, I might add, is invariably a case of vice versa. Wherever Mitch sticks around for long people beg him to stay. He's been offered very soft setups in several places and a life of ease, absolutely gratis and with no strings attached, if he'd put down roots for keeps. In one Southern city a local moneybags told him, "Bob, why don't you stay here and go in business with me?"

"Business?" puzzled Bob. "Why, I don't know anything about your business."

"Don't have to," he was told. "Got a bookkeeper who takes care of that. All you've got to do is go fishin'. Come on, join the club. I'll deal you right in." But Mitch only laughed, although he was grateful.

Another oil tycoon in Texas offered him the same kind of fantastic free deal—20 per cent in a new company which would have netted Mitch $180,000 the first year! And just because he liked Bob's company. That sort of thing is likely to pop up whenever genial Bob mixes with the idle rich. They go for his good-fellowship, humor, sportsmanship—and they want to keep him idle, too, by giving him "part of the store." But with Mitch that, of course, is strictly no go. He's too independent. "I couldn't be anybody's pet," he explains, "that's not my style"—as if he had to tell you.

Bob will kid even his best friends that what he wants out of life are simply days of ease. "Been trying for 35 years to figure how to keep away from work," he'll state solemnly, which, of course, doesn't jibe with the facts. What Bob really wants, and he'll admit it if you pin him down, is a life of variety, adventure, action and satisfactory fulfillment. Sports give him no charge. Football games, tennis matches, even prize fights bore him. He thinks golf's silly. His pal, Jerry Devine, is always trying to talk him into sports contests. "What for?" Jerry gets. "Somebody runs up and down a field and somebody else runs down. Somebody hits a ball and somebody hits it back. So what?" But if you tell him where the big trout lie or a buck deer is feeding he'll get fidgety and move heaven and earth—and sometimes even Hollywood—to get there.

What gives Bob Mitchum the glooms about his Hollywood fate, each time he returns from a ramble and makes him champ to escape again, are some of the things most stars dearly prize: "I like making pictures," he'll explain, "but I don't like being a movie star." He doesn't like the phoniness, the flattery, the pedestal placing, the hassle, the pull and haul of a frenetic business. He doesn't like the red tape, the protocol, the fear, the deals, sometimes the stupidity. He doesn't like the lack of freedom, being the slave of a phone call. He doesn't like the monotony of "walking through my pictures." What would satisfy and calm him down more than anything is to get something real of himself or the world he knows on film—or, even better, between the covers of a book.

"I want to write, I always have," Bob confesses. "But I can't do it here. I don't have time to think, let alone write. So I want a ranch, somewhere where there's good fishing, good hunting, good land and pasture. That's what I'll have when I get the dough. I figure I could cash in right now for maybe $100,000. But that's not enough. I want a good place, I want to seed it and build it up, stock it and make it produce."

jects. But after a while he discovered that she was capable of discussing a good deal more. As a matter of fact, Marlon is himself quite an authority on a lot of subjects, for he is an avid scholar, but he found out that Movita was as good, if not better, a conversationalist on most of the things he knew about.

They had a lot of fun on that location. The director was Elia Kazan, a man who believes in making his company happy—and there were lots of jokes and parties in the evenings when there was not an early call or the weather was bad. Marlon, of course, was still Marlon Brando and didn't commit himself to romance. But he did spend most of his time with the Latin girl and was truly sorry when the location trip was over.

When Viva Zapata was finished, Marlon was asked to stick around Hollywood for a couple of weeks until it was decided if retakes were necessary. This happens after most pictures and generally Marlon's agent, MCA, dreaded these days. When a day's shooting is scheduled it is generally suddenly, and never before, on other pictures, had they been able to ferret Marlon out for at least a couple of days. But this time it was different. They knew just where he was almost every minute. That was wherever Movita was. It was pleasant for the studio, to say the least.

But then, of course, came the inevitable day we spoke about. The day the studio told Marlon he could go home—and he had to make his difficult decision. It is a testament to his beliefs that he would never seriously fall in love or marry that he cuddled his pet in his arms and left Movita standing at the airport.

Movita Doyle is not just an ordinary woman, and that should be pointed out here. She came to Hollywood in 1934 and was promptly signed by MGM to play the role of Clark Gable's Polynesian sweetheart in Mutiny On The Bounty. All Holly-

W HEN Dorothy Mitchum hears Bob talk like that she moves a little closer to the fire and knits a little faster. She remembers the days when meeting the rent was a chronic problem and the cupboard bare. But she's been Bob Mitchum's gal ever since she was 14 and she still is. She'd go anywhere he said, even if the Mandeville canyon house does seem mighty safe and solid when a chill wind blows, and the baby cozy, the boys all settled in their school routines. But Bob has an answer for that, too.

"My kids are Mitchums," he says. "They don't need cozy corners or safe routines. They need love and care and a good education—and that they'll get. But I'm not too sure the only place in the world for them is Hollywood. I'll keep Oochapap ready to roll."

Someday maybe it will again, and keep rolling—and maybe it won't. No one who knows Bob Mitchum could say for sure about that and I doubt if Bob could either, right now. But he's no more tamed, domesticated, housebroken or softened up, really, than he was the first day he "dropped down from a Greyhound bus on Hollywood Boulevard with his pants patched and his elbows busting through his coat sleeves. He may stay in Hollywood until he grows a long, gray beard—or he may blow tomorrow—I wouldn't know."

All I know is that sitting in his comfortable, big house by the fireside with safe and sane security on all sides he can still hear the wild geese trumpet disturbingly. And after he's gone for a look and comes back in the house, sometimes he says to himself just a little anxiously, "I'm 35. It's getting late outside." END

love comes to marlon brando

(Continued from page 29) ticket for it as he said he would. They said he could cage it and put it in the baggage car, but it would not be allowed on any other part of the train. Marlon's answer was that any man who would coop a raccoon up for four days was not human, so he went over and bought a ticket on an airline that was more considerate of dumb animals.

And so, when the plane was leaving, Movita stood tearfully aside as Marlon and the raccoon boarded the plane—and as it took off she no doubt pondered bitterly on the chill superiority of men and raccoons.

That was just a little more than a year ago. A month ago, a Hollywood columnist, writing in one of the journals that is read by all filmdom, came up with this sparkling item. "It must be love for Marlon Brando," the gossipier wrote. "He has given up his raccoon for Movita."

During the year between these two incidents much happened, much that restored Movita's faith in the human race, and much that taught Marlon Brando the ways of love. The actor who had been the toast of the unmarried theatrical set for several years, the lad who had treated even the greatest ladies among his admirers like his servants, fell in love—even to the point where he gave up his most precious companion for the lady of his heart.

Marlon Brando met Movita, who's true name, by the way, is Mrs. Jack Doyle, shortly after he began shooting Viva Zapata. It was in Texas, on location down by the Rio Grande River, and Movita was one of the supporting players brought from Hollywood for the film. During the evening, after the day's work was done, the company stayed pretty close together and it was only natural that a fellow finally found a girl he liked to discuss the weather and life with. Marlon was introduced to the dark-eyed beauty and started to work on those sub-wood raved about her. She was the toast of the MGM lot, but it just seemed as though the cards were stacked against her, for, although she made a few other pictures, none of them were big enough or good enough to follow Mutiny and she slowly fell from popularity.

In the meanwhile, in another part of the world, a young Irishman named Jack Doyle began making a name for himself. He was in the British Army and a London fight promoter saw him box in an amateur match. Sensing color, the promoter bought him out of the service, a process allowed at that time, and made a professional of him. Doyle was a handsome lad and every inch as much of a character in his line as Marlon Brando is in the acting profession today. He was never credited with being a great fighter, but he was certainly colorful both in the ring and in private life.

Any time Jack Doyle was fighting, the patrons could be sure something unexpected would happen, like somebody being thrown out of the ring, or somebody slugging the referee. Consequently, he was a big draw and became rich and famous in the British Isles. Jack Doyle and Movita met about the time both of their stars were dimming and shortly afterwards married and went to live in Ireland.

Before and during the past war they were familiar sights in the London night spots—and their hassles were as famous over there as the spats of Lupe Velez and Johnny Weissmuller were over here—and just as colorful. Movita Doyle, because of her beauty and her fiery temperament, was considered splendid company and she moved in the best social circles in the British Isles. When her marriage to Doyle went on the rocks, she was much sought after and could have had almost any of the eligible bachelors around for the nodding of her pretty head.

This was the kind of woman Marlon Brando left waiting at the Los Angeles International Airport in 1951. And surely she must have known as she walked slowly to her car that one day he'd be back, or that he'd ask her to come to him. Not even Marlon could escape the Movita charm.

Marlon held out in New York for about two weeks, during which time he telephoned a few times "just to say hello." Then he telephoned late one night and told the truth. Life was dull in Manhattan without her. He missed all the rough-house fun they had and the conversations. Wouldn't she come back and pay a visit. Well, she did—and there is no record in the gossip columns of his dating any other girl since. Marlon is not a café society man. He likes to patronize places of entertainment off the beaten track, so not too many of the Gotham reporters saw him with Movita. Not enough anyway to start the rumors of a serious romance.

But their friends knew it was serious. They were together constantly at parties and just visiting at the apartments of friends. And just before spring in 1952 the word was about that Marlon was going to marry the girl. It has even been said that he did marry her but no proof of this has ever been found—and neither one of them is ever likely to admit it.

ANOTHER parting loomed early in 1952 when Marlon had to go to Europe to talk over some picture deals. But this time he didn't leave Movita on the dock; she tagged along. All summer long they toured the continent, had gay times in Paris and visited out of the way places together. Movita was a wonderful guide, too, for she had been to most of the places Marlon wanted to see before—and could speak most of the European languages.

Some of their friends say that one of the reasons Marlon agreed to come back to Hollywood to play Marc Antony in Julius Caesar is that Movita said she just had to go home and visit her family and Marlon didn't want her to leave him alone. At any rate, they arrived together—and stayed together all during the shooting of the picture.

Marlon's desire to be close to Movita at all times is illustrated in an amusing story that came off the set of Julius Caesar. It seems that Movita played a small role in the film and had to be down in the crowd that milled about the steps of a Roman palace. Marlon disappeared and when the scene was finished the assistant directors began looking for him. He was nowhere to be found until one of the assistants happened to look down in the milling mob and saw Marlon sitting on a stone bench talking to Movita. He had, without anyone being aware of it, been playing an extra in the picture in which he was starring.

If you are not familiar with Marlon Brando you would never guess from seeing him and Movita at a private party that they were in love. Most men, paying court to a girl, stick close to her and hold her hand, or once in a while slip over and give her an affectionate peck on the cheek. Marlon shows his devotion in another manner. He will look across a room at Movita—and then make a charge and a flying tackle, throwing her to the ground where he will plant a fair example of a loving kiss right on the top of her nose. Or he will pick her up, when they are leaving, and carry her to the car—or home if it is not too far—on his back. It is unorthodox treatment all right, but she seems to like it.

To understand why Marlon Brando likes Movita better than the other women in his life, one must look into his relationships with other women. If he is not the least bit romantically interested in a girl, Marlon treats her like a boy scout treats his mother. He is the soul of politeness and consideration, almost courtly in his manner. But if there is any spark of the male and female nonsense between them he is as different as Jekyll was from Hyde. He becomes terribly disinterested, then bored and finally, when the romance is in high gear, downright hateful to the girl. Shelley Winters, in the lonely days before she met her present husband and found happiness, was one of the women who made the mistake of letting Marlon know she liked him. Shelley, who could get most bachelors in Hollywood by dropping her handkerchief, got nothing but rebuffs from the fellow—and when he did give her the pleasure of his company she had to follow after him and not lead the way. At one time many of her friends wanted to punch him in the nose—thinking he was doing her wrong—but it was just Marlon's way of handling girls.

Then there was Marilyn Monroe who had a crush on him at one time. Nothing much ever came of this romance, probably because Marilyn was too popular for that kind of treatment. But if you had seen them together, you would have suspected that Marlon hated her. And Roberta Haynes, the girl who just co-starred with Gary Cooper in Return To Paradise, was another in love with Marlon. She admits it and to this day can't understand why he treated her as though she were his maid.

MARLON BRANDO, then, has to have a woman with fire. And one capable of hanging him by the heels. Movita is that kind of a girl. On the few occasions he has reverted to type, once their firm relationship was established, she has put him in his place but fast. Their friends say that on the smallest hint of a slight from him she will hit him over the head with the handiest blunt object. And if he seems to be getting out of line, such as flirting with another girl, she's just as liable as not to toss him on her shoulder and carry him to the car, or home if it is not too far.

What is to finally become of the Brando-Movita relationship only time can say. As we said, before, it is whispered that they are already married, but not confirmed. As far as Hollywood is concerned, no one here knows very much about them or their plans. They keep well away from sources of information to the press—and when they go off some place together they have no brass band announcing their movements as some stars do. But there is one thing the pals they do have will assure you of—and that is that they think they will always be together. There is a crazy kind of a bond between them. A crazy kind of a love that keeps them together.

The business of choosing between his raccoon and Movita is amusing on the surface, but not at all funny or a light matter to Marlon and Movita. Marlon is fanatically fond of animals. He would rather pet a dog than shake hands with a celebrity. He has a kinship with dumb things that is really beautiful. And he likes the wild things better than the tame. That is why his mother, who knows him better than anyone else, gave him the raccoon.

A raccoon is an affectionate animal and willful enough to make keeping one around the house a pleasant contest. Marlon was crazy about the beast as soon as he had it—and has been known to leave the most charming company when he felt he ought to go home and feed it or give it a little cheer. No matter where he went, until he decided about Movita, he took the raccoon. Once he went to Cincinnati to make a personal appearance with one of his movies—and naturally took the animal along.

He was met at the plane by a representative of the film company (who was rather astonished to see his star alight in a suit of old clothes, carrying a raccoon) and escorted to the hotel. In the room the press agent outlined the plans for the evening. They were to include a dinner with city officials, meetings with the local press, a couple of appearances at the theatre showing the movie and a few jaunts about town that would get them home in the small hours of the morning.

While the press agent was talking, Marlon held the pet in his arms and stroked it thoughtfully. When the agent was finished he had something else he wanted to get off his chest.

"Mr. Brando," he said, "I want to thank you for coming down here. They tell me in the home office you don't like to make personal appearances—as a matter of fact never do. And I want you to know how much I appreciate your coming down here. And I want to say that if there is anything I can do for you here in Cincinnati, just mention it and it's done. Anything."

Marlon looked at him for a long moment. "Anything?" he asked.

"Anything!" said the press agent emphatically.

"Very well," said Marlon, "get me another raccoon to sit with mine while we're out."

YES, the final act of love that Marlon Brando could do for his girl was to give up his raccoon. It was not that Movita was jealous of Marlon's affection for the animal. It was just that she found tagging along with her boy friend became quite a chore when everything they had to do revolved around the creature's comfort and happiness. It couldn't be left alone for too long a time or it might decide to tear the apartment apart. And if they planned a trip somewhere they had to make sure they found a place that would rent a room to Marlon and a raccoon. This was extremely difficult. Then, most kennels, glad to take dogs of any breed for a few days, absolutely refused to have a raccoon in the place. This tied them down considerably. Another cause for dissension was that it was generally Movita who wound up cleaning up after the pet—and that is not much of a job for a lady—especially an exotic beauty.

Well, one day they had a bitter quarrel about it. The first serious quarrel they had ever had. They didn't speak for several days. But Marlon Brando, whatever his faults are, is not a man to bicker. He weighs the pros and cons of a problem, makes up his mind about it and acts irrevocably. He finally called Movita on the phone.

"Why don't you come on over tonight," he asked. "Maybe we can have dinner together."

Movita agreed. She was just about to call him anyway.

Marlon met her at the door and asked her to come in while he finished combing his hair. Movita walked into the flat, walked around the living room for a moment, then noticed something missing.

"Hey," she called in to the other room. "Where's the baby?"

"Oh, him," said Marlon casually. "I had him crated up and sent back to my mother at the farm. I guess you were right. He'll be happier there."

That's all that was ever said about it. But they both knew a sacrifice had been made for love. And when Marlon went back to New York a few weeks later, he had no problems. And his girl wasn't left waiting at the airport, either.

the christmas they couldn't see

Ah yes, the children. But with a difference. Much the same, at casual glance, as your children and mine—pretty and sweet, happy and gay, in love with life and with a party.

But there was a difference. You see, these three- and four-year-olds attending Esther's party, are blind. They cannot see color and form. They cannot see lovely, willowy Esther as she moves gracefully among them, leaving a hug here, a kiss there. They cannot see jolly old Santa Claus, or the lights on the tree, or the silver tinsel, or the red-and-white stripes of the candy canes. These children are blind—totally, irrevocably. This is, in truth, a Christmas they cannot see.

Where does Esther Williams fit into all this? Why does she devote so much of her energy and limited time to these blind tykes at the Los Angeles Nursery School for Visually Handicapped Children? She has two wonderful boys of her own, that is true, but two-year-old Kim and three-year-old Benjy are normal youngsters physically and mentally, who take up a good deal of Esther's time. Why then does she give of herself to these other children, these visually handicapped boys and girls, often to the point of exhaustion?

I asked her. The familiar, warm Esther Williams smile danced across her face as she replied, "I'm glad you asked, Mike, because I've been wanting to tell you. I want the whole world to know about these children!"

It all happened three years ago, Esther explained, when she was asked to model at the Harold Lloyd benefit party for the Nursery School. "I did a strip tease, of a sort," she recalled. "Louis B. Mayer bought the dress I wore, an Adrian original, and sent it to me afterwards as a gift. Ted Bris-kin bought the bathing suit underneath.

"I became very curious about the organization and asked in detail what it was all about. My heart went out to these blind babies. They're born that way, I found out, most of them prematurely.

"They told me that when the Nursery work was first started in 1935, many blind children aged three or four were brought in in pathetic condition, and it was a question as to whether they ever would be able to enter the first grade.

"They told me about Sally, who didn't walk or talk, was rigid, tense, and proclaimed an imbecile. They told me about little Bob, who had been held and cuddled so much that his arms and legs were like gelatin. With little Sally, I'm happy to say, constant training proved the first diagnosis wrong. She was quite normal—in fact, of superior mental capacity! With Bob, proper stimulus soon developed a normal body."

Shortly after the benefit party, Esther said, she was carrying her first baby, and since she was unable to continue with her motion picture work during those months, she had a lot of time to mull over what she had heard concerning the Nursery School. She visited the Adams Street school to see what it was like.

"I love children," Esther said, "and when I learned that this type of eye difficulty is the third most serious disease for children, and that the Nursery School had facilities for only eight, I was determined to study and work hard in order to learn how to teach handicapped children such as these to adjust themselves in this world of ours. Just think, there were only five such schools in the entire country, and this one 80 had a waiting list of 200 children! Many of them came in during the day and had to go home again at night. I felt I had to help them!"

Although, as Esther explained, she could do nothing immediately to earn funds for the School since she was pregnant, she was able to teach the children to swim. These boys and girls couldn't run or play games where sight was necessary, but lots of people swim with their eyes closed. This, Esther decided, she could and would teach them to do.

She took the children to a heated pool regularly three times a week until just a month before her own Benjy was born. She recalls that even when she was very tired and it was a terrible burden to keep on with the swimming lessons, she experienced a curious urgency to go ahead with the work. "A still, small voice inside me seemed to ask, 'Why do you feel this urgency, this drive, why do you keep going when it would be so easy to plead illness?'"

"A terrible, agonizing thought struck me: 'Am I doing all this because I'm going to have a blind baby?'" It was like a pressure. It was driving me mad. I always answered myself with 'You'll be a better mother as a result of all this study and teaching. And you'll be prepared, if the worst happens, to be the mother of a blind child!'"

In desperation, Esther recalls, she finally turned to her "favorite companion," her mother, a child psychologist and founder of the Southwest Counselling Service in Los Angeles, and confided the fears and the doubts that had been tormenting her.

"Mother, as usual, set me straight," Esther said. "She put her arms around me and said, 'Darling, maybe you're doing this so you won't have a blind baby. Did you ever think of that? Maybe you're earning your own perfectly healthy child."

"And you know, I'm sure now she was right. You see, I had lost a baby prematurely—my first—before Benjy was born, and subconsciously I had been connecting this incident with the possibility that I might again have a premature baby and that its eyes might not be properly formed, as is the case with those children I had been teaching to swim. I was trying to earn a healthy child."

I asked her, "Doesn't it break your heart to work with blind children?"

"Oh, no," Esther replied, "I regard it as a privilege and honor to be able to help in some way. How wonderful it is if I can, in my small way, help them to live their lives as useful citizens. After all, they're not hopeless invalids."

Esther recounted for me her first enlightening experience as she watched the teachers at the school in order to learn how to handle the children. "I watched a baby just learning to walk, head straight for a chair. I stood by and watched him run right into it and hurt himself. It seemed heartless, but the wise instructor said you have to let them run into obstructions, in their blindness, and sometimes even hurt themselves. It's the only way they can learn to be aware of obstacles."

Two years ago, as a Christmas gift, Esther and her husband, Ben Gage, presented the school with a specially constructed swimming pool and Esther trained the teachers in instructing the children to swim. The heated pool is four feet deep all the way around, and with encircling steps. There are guard rails on all four corners to guide the children up the steps. The children were frightened of the water at first, Esther said. Once they're in the water, they don't have the one security they depended upon before—a firm support under their feet. The water is, at first, a strange, terrifying, new, dark world and their only support is gone. They have to be won over to it, and then when they become friends with this new medium their laughter and enjoyment is just like that of any normal child.

"One day," Esther recalled, "little Thayer got water splashed in her eyes. Of course, this disturbed me and I asked one of the instructors whether or not it was possible for the water to injure the children's eyes in any way. She explained that they have no sensation in the eye, painful or otherwise, and that sometimes they actually lean on their handicap to gain sympathy—which is, after all, a very normal human reaction.

"So Thayer was using her handicap as an excuse not to concentrate on her swimming lesson. I said, 'We won't let you play with the other children if you don't learn to swim.' She said, 'But the water hurts my eyes when they splash me!' So I said, 'Hey, the water doesn't hurt your eyes and you know it!' We made a game of it and splashed back and forth. She came over afterwards and said, 'I'm sorry. I was fooling you. It didn't hurt my eyes. I don't have any eyes, Aunt Esther, so how can I hurt them?'"

"You see," Esther explained, "the teaching approach is honest and straightforward. The children must accept the fact that they were born without eyes and cannot see as other people see. They must learn to think, 'now let's get to work and do something to make up for it!'"

And Esther tells this poignant story. "One day little five-year-old Barbara said to me, 'What color is your dress?'"

"You have no idea how regularly we all say 'Look,' 'You'll see,' or 'I'll show you' until you work with the blind. Anyway, I said, 'I can't tell you because you've never seen colors.'

"She said, 'But I think maybe you can tell me! Is it sun color?'"

"I said 'yes' because the dress was yellow and had white trim. Then I walked over to the superintendent and asked if Barbara had ever been able to see. She said, 'Yes, she lost her sight when she was two.' She was remembering the colors she had seen up to the time she was two! I walked back to Barbara and said, 'Darling, tell me something. Do you know what color yellow is?' 'Sure,' she said, 'it's the color of a dandelion.' 'And the trim is white,' I added. She exclaimed, 'Oh, like when a dandelion goes poof! See, Aunt Esther, I remember all the old things!'"

SUDDENLY Esther remembered she was hostess at a gay Christmas party for 17 lovely, lively children, and watching her move around among her guests, my heart wasn't as heavy as it had been. These boys and girls no longer appeared handicapped, no longer objects for pity and sympathy. They were normal children, I told myself, but without sight. They like to romp and wrestle. They shriek and laugh with delight when they are happy. They shed tears when they are hurt. They like to hear stories, to eat ice cream and cake, to "see" loveliness with their fingers and ears, and yes—they like to swim. And they weren't loving or enjoying Esther Williams, motion picture star. They appreciate her as a warm-hearted friend only, because, remember they had never seen and will never see a motion picture. It was a Christmas party they couldn't see, there's no denying that—but oh, how they could feel it!

In the first place, she is Secretary-Treasurer of the Brinkman Manufacturing Company, a firm which turns out precision aircraft parts. The President and owner is her husband, Paul Brinkman. At first, or even third glance, Jeanne does not appear the type to understand cams, grommets or sumps, and indeed she does not. She describes her husband's firm as one which "makes pistons and things that make motors go." On the other hand, she does understand and takes a keen interest in the business itself. To Jeanne, the business world is a deeply fascinating thing, and she is one of those rare women who devour the "Business" section in news magazines. She was appointed Secretary-Treasurer solely because of the legal aspect of owning a firm that is a family affair, and admittedly has little to do with making decisions. More or less as a gag, Paul had a box of business cards printed, including her name and title, and while Jeanne isn't quite sure what to do with them—"I'll drop them places"—she takes a whimsical pride in their existence.

Occasionally she will put in her oar, such as the time when Paul, after building a new plant, changed the name of the firm from the ABC Die and Engineering Company to The Brinkman Manufacturing Company.

The Secretary-Treasurer gave this due consideration and then asked, "Don't you think it's rather unusual to use our name in the title?"

The President promptly overruled her objection. "Look at the Ford Motor Company—and Firestone—and Westinghouse," he said. "Those are owners' names."

"Yes, sir," said the Secretary-Treasurer.

She attends business meetings regularly and takes active interest in the proceedings. On these occasions she wears a business-type suit and modifies her hair-do and make-up for the occasion. "I feel like Roz Russell in a movie role," she says.

When Paul brings business associates home for dinner, Jeanne pulls a switch, and being now the hostess rather than the businesswoman, blossoms out in décolleté evening clothes that shimmer in the candlelight. She is attentive to conversations that might bore many a woman, yet retains the femininity so important to wives of successful young businessmen.

THIS in itself is perhaps the whole secret of Jeanne's glamor, for she does have that. She is perpetually feminine, in her gestures, her thought, her walk and her clothes, and whether she is discussing a new role for herself, a business deal for Paul's firm, or drawing bead on a duck in flight, she is always completely so.

Paul is a sportsman—he likes to fish and ski and hunt, and he hoped from the first that Jeanne would share his enthusiasm. As a new bridegroom his first Christmas gifts to her were a skeet rifle, a Western belt and a cartridge case. Mrs. Brinkman took the hint and tried her hand at shooting. It turned out like everything else. Jeanne has the inclination, but not the talent. She is a fair golfer, a fair tennis player, so-so as an angler, can master a beginners' slope when skiing, and didn't swim well until their own pool was installed. It is a frustration with her, this urge to be good at sports, and while she is skilled enough in most things to make a good companion for Paul, she has found that where there is a will there isn't always a way.

On ice skates she is a competent dream; it is the only sport in which she is adept.

In other things she is merely a dream, not only because she looks well in the clothes required by each sport, but also because she really does try. Other women who visit Mount Rose near Reno may sit on the porch of the lodge modeling their striking ski clothes, but Jeanne is always out on the practice run, working like a beaver, going up the slope time after time to learn control of the skis. As she puts it, "I love the snow, and the clothes, and the cold and the fun at the resorts—but I can't ski!"

She goes hunting with Paul, but while she shrinks at the thought of the big brown eyes of the deer, she knows Paul is a true sportsman, and refrains from spoiling his fun by mentioning her qualms. When ducks are in season, she climbs out of bed at 2:30 in the morning and into her warm clothes, grabs her hip boots and goes merrily off with Paul on the four-hour drive to the duck country. No matter what Jeanne does she always looks like a magazine cover, and the impression of glamor is heightened by her intelligent interest. For her husband, she is the perfect companion because while she plays a good game, she never wins.

SHE is also feminine in that she is an incurable shopper. At Palm Springs she will drag on Paul's arm as they pass a shop window. "Please, I want to look at those purses."

"How many purses do you have now?" he says.

"About a dozen, I guess."

"Then, why do you want to look at them? You don't need any more."

"Because I want to look," says Jeanne with feminine logic.

They don't get away from home often. Paul is at his plant most mornings by seven and doesn't get home until six in the evening; and in between babies Jeanne has starred in a continual stream of movies. The brief weekends are treasured, for within a few hours' drive from Los Angeles are the mountains at Lake Arrowhead, the surf at Laguna Beach, the desert at the Palm Springs, the ranches near Victorville, or Mexico to the south. These short trips, even if they happen but once every six weeks, make the Brinkman marriage a constant honeymoon. Jeanne feels that "getting away from it all" is a very necessary thing in anyone's life; that it gives renewed vigor and bounce. In the months when she was making one picture after another her career became the only thing in her life, and while she loves movie work, Jeanne is a many faceted person and requires a variety of interests.

At home, she never finds enough time for the things she wants to do. She is a calm person, and her friends often remark about the fact that Jeanne never seems ruffled, no matter what pressures or emergencies may arise. A woman who is taut and harried, continually shuffling problems that bewilder her, seldom carries the aura of glamor, and Jeanne escapes this tension by moving sedately through life, ever ready with quick decisions. She has a positive approach to everything, and through her own career has learned how annoying it is to come home and be surrounded with the petty problems that go hand-in-hand with a large household. As a result she shields Paul from the miniature typhoons that periodically blow through their home: the broken washing machine, the rash on Mike's arm, the gopher under the azalea bed and the cook who quit without notice. "I don't think a man should be burdened with the little annoyances," she says. Then adds with a wise little smile, "Maybe women give a little bit more than men in a marriage, but if they do, they get back more, too."

Around the house, Jeanne wears her collection of short cotton brunch coats, long ago having given up the fussy productions, the things that have to be zipped or buttoned at myriad points. She shows up for breakfast every morning with a scrubbed face and shining hair and a fresh morning coat, and stays that way until it's time to bathe and dress for Paul's homecoming. Being well groomed for the dinner hour is important with her, and she has found that it had to be made a habit. Otherwise, the unexpected sometimes happened and she failed to be ready to meet him at the front door. "Men notice things like that," she says, "no matter what their age." The added thought refers to her trio of sons, who howl with delight when they see her "dressed up." The brighter the colors the better, and Jeanne thinks this goes for the adult male, as well. When she turns out in red the two-year-old Timothy croons happily

IT HAPPENED TO ME

I had just bought a copy of MODERN SCREEN, and was standing in the drugstore at Selma and Vine Streets, in Hollywood, reading an article called "How Dopey Can He Get?" when a gentleman brushed past me mumbling, "Excuse me." Imagine my surprise when I looked up and saw the star of the story, Gordon MacRae, luying some toothpaste and grinning at me.

and remarks "Da doll!" a pet name originated for his small sister and lately applied to all likely looking females.

JEANNE is always on the prowl for new fashion ideas, and when she comes home after a fashion show her program is covered with scribbles. Deciphered, they are reminders to try a pin here or a pin there, or a novel way to wear a scarf, a trick with sweaters, or to see if she has any hat that would take a wide ribbon like that pillbox number at the show. Jeanne isn't what is termed a pace setter in fashions, but she does give her wardrobe and grooming minute attention, despite the fact that more often than not she is "helped" in getting dressed by her offspring. The boys drag out their respective choices—shoes, gloves, jewelry and bags—and Jeanne calmly puts them back where they belong and goes on with her original plans.

She has her own dryer at home and has devoted one corner of her dressing room to what she likes to think of as her own beauty parlor. She shampoos and sets her own hair at least once a week, and always performs the operation when Paul is not at home.

Jeanne loves to draw a pleasing assortment of wolf whistles around town. Like most movie stars she is well known in Beverly Hills, where the citizens are usually respectful, but away from the neighborhood she has been known to snarl traffic. The characters who try to whistle down lone women drivers have a tough subject in Jeanne Crain, but also a fairly considerate one. "I don't like to see the poor men wasting time and energy trying to keep up with me in traffic," she says. "So I nonchalantly adjust the mirror on the side of the car until I'm sure they've seen my wedding ring." She feels she can't be too annoyed because once, eight years 81 ago, there was a young man who used to follow her car around town, a handsome man named Brinkman.

Besides, Jeanne likes wolf whistles, and is frank enough to admit it. "If I don't get any for a while I begin worrying about it. If you've ever noticed, they don't happen when you look tired or grumpy, and I think if you suddenly realize the whistles have died down it's time to take a good look at yourself."

Jeanne almost always defers to Paul in the majority of problems, and career or no career, continues to be a wife to him in every sense of the word. She sees to it that his clothes are in order, that his shirts are properly ironed, and his sock supply is plentiful. When they were first married she refrained from fussy frills in their bedroom, giving him the edge with masculine grey woodwork and grey wallpaper. It's only lately that she's begun to think about painting the woodwork a peach color. "Not too peachy, but just enough to relieve the feeling that I sleep in a bachelor dormitory." She smiled. "Maybe having a daughter has finally given me courage."

When Paul built the new plant and wondered about decorating his office Jeanne pitched in to help. She suggested wood panelling on all four walls. "And we can hang up that deer head that's been sitting on top of the freezer in the garage." She spent many days on the project, which luckily came at the time when, after Jeanne's birth, there was a long period of rest before making a movie—O. Henry's Full House. But the free period had flown by on wings. For Jeanne there is never enough time. There is not only her job of being wife and mother and running the house and maintaining what is ordinarily a full time career, but there are her hobbies, too.

Jeanne's hobbies tend to be the clutter type; things like painting and keeping scrapbooks. After seven years of bumping into easels and stepping on clippings smeared with paste, Paul built Jeanne her own tiny house, tucked away up on the hill at the back of their property. Jeanne calls it her studio and is ecstatically happy over having, at last, a place where she can paint and putter to her heart's content. No one else is allowed to enter, and Jeanne even insists on cleaning it herself because if a maid ever broke in and tidied up the place, Mrs. Brinkman wouldn't be able to find a thing. The children have seen it, of course, and once in a while Jeanne will extend an invitation to them, one at a time, to join her in her leisure hours. Each has his own smock and equipment.

OTHERWISE, its security is inviolate, and there's no one to complain about its dishevelment. It's bound to be that way, too, for Jeanne is an inveterate scrapbook-keeper, having one on home furnishing ideas, one on fashion, one on entertaining, a big book of family pictures, all her publicity clippings, and even a guest book which she keeps supplied with pictures of friends as well as their autographs. None of them are ever up to date, naturally. The one drawback of having the little studio is the fact that there is seldom time to spend there.

Next to the Lady of Guadalupe medal, it is her most treasured gift from Paul. The medal, incidentally, was a gift on their fifth anniversary. Five star-shaped diamonds are set around the rim, and three rubies in the center, representing the boys. Recently Paul has added an emerald in honor of their only daughter, and Jeanne prizes the ornament above all other material things in her life.

It is not only for the sentiment, but also for the beauty, for by now, having gone through the practical cycle of marriage and motherhood and career, Jeanne is back in the old glamor groove. In the first flush of her marriage and the resultant dip into domesticity, she found few things more exciting than the new dishwasher, the new stove, the carpeting of the house. She recalls that when they went on the big adventure to buy an incinerator they got so carried away that they bought a huge model in a soft shade of green to blend with the pepper tree.

"Things have changed," says Jeanne with a toss of her red gold hair. "Nowadays, I'd rather have a small diamond than a large washing machine." END

so in love

(Continued from page 30) warm personality is directly accountable. He married Rita because he loves her and he says he wants to stay married to her because he still loves her. Yet, by the standards of the western world, he is utterly incomprehensible as a husband. For some 1,300 years in the known history of his family its men have lived as they pleased—which means today exactly what it has always meant. To their wives, secluded in harems, this may or may not have been always acceptable, but tradition and laws gave them no other choice. To a girl like Rita Hayworth, born not only beautiful, but free, it has been something else—something she has tried to live with only to find it, again and again, intolerable. That's why Attorney Bartley Crum reportedly flew to Europe in late October; to finalize the divorce and arrange a settlement of reportedly a million and a half.

She left him—once before. But where there is love there is hope—and Rita has always listened to love. She came back. And the fact that she has again run off, causing everyone to label her flighty and inconsistent, is the most human thing about Rita in the opinion of her friends, if not Aly's. She tried. She may even try again. And with a husband like Aly this could probably get her nowhere again—but if that isn't love, what is? As she herself said to reporters in Spain, "My leaving is exclusively a very intimate matter of the heart."

"What's she thinking about?" her critics ask. "How does she justify such behavior? Can't she make up her mind?" The answer is that she isn't thinking. She is a wife in a quandary. Any woman who has been in love, any wife who has faced a similar problem, knows the answer. Do they always use logic at such times—or rarely? Doesn't any woman do what she can . . . fight?

DESPITE the fact that Aly made no promises when he came to Beverly Hills to get her, and that she returned on his 82 terms so to speak, there was every indication that he was prepared to curb his self-indulgences and take life more seriously. They both knew (and it is still true) that he cannot afford more scandal. As the heir of the Aga Khan (who if he lives until 1954, when he'll be 79, expects to be gifted with platinum equal to his weight to commemorate his 70th year as leader of his Mohammedan following) Aly must sober down considerably.

In the last year he has awakened to his responsibility and is grooming himself towards taking over his father's vast religious empire. The Aga Khan fully expects this and has waved aside any speculation that Aly won't succeed him. "Of course he will," he has declared. But if Aly brings disgrace on the house of Khan, it is not inconceivable that his half-brother, Prince Sadri Aga Khan, now attending Harvard, may replace him as the heir. Sharpening the whole situation is the fact that for the first time in years the Aga Khan will not make his annual winter pilgrimage to Africa, and India (Pakistan) to greet his followers. On the advice of his physicians he will stay in the south of France, and Aly is to take his place. Rita might have accompanied him, had she not decided to break up again.

If for no other reason marriage is desirable because it offers a mantle of respectability to Aly. But there are other reasons. It is known he dislikes being open game for the more predatory femme fatales that have a habit of turning up wherever he puts in an appearance. If shouldn't be forgotten that he was married the first time he met Rita and it was not until he decided that he wanted her that he moved to divorce his wife.

Yet the very day she left this last time, the day she quietly moved from his villa into a hotel, Aly was not at all visibly sunk in the despair you would expect. Nor did he talk like a man who had failed to keep his wife after traveling 7,000 miles to effect her return. He showed up, chipper and smiling, at Paris' market place for pure-blooded horses, the Chez Cheri on the Rue Ernest Deloisian, where an important sale was being held. The next day the Prix de l'Arc de Triomphe, one of the year's biggest races, was held at the Longchamps racetrack. Aly's father, the Aga Khan, had two horses entered (one of them, Nuccio, won it) and Aly was again very much evident and again was his usual self. By this time, news of Rita's departure from his home was beginning to leak out, but Aly had no comment. He greeted friends, ducked a countless or two whom he considers pests, and when a girl reporter tried to talk about Rita he countered with a characteristic Aly response: the offer to buy her a drink.

Was he being a Pagliacci and suffering the torment of a rejected husband under a smiling mask . . . or was he unaffected by what had happened? As far as his friends were concerned it didn't matter . . . the important thing was that he was playing the game as an aristocrat should and not being so crass as to reveal emotional turmoil. To them, to both the men and women in his circle, this counts strongly. Over their champagne glasses they kept asking, "What does this girl (meaning Rita) want?"

RITE's story is very simple. After being married to Aly for more than three years, she thought they had agreed to settle down—and found they had nothing to settle down to. To begin with, when she left Aly the first time, there is a conviction here that another woman was to blame. This girl, who wanted very much to succeed Rita in Aly's affections, arranged that Rita should hear reports well calculated to sicken her of Paris and make her run back to America. This was one of the things Aly had to clear up by long distance phone to Beverly Hills before he even thought it worthwhile to make the trip there . . . and he did. It is also to Aly's credit that he has never been anything but icily polite to this rival of Rita's since.

But when Rita, with this episode forgiven, returned to Paris she began to hear gossip involving another woman—Lauren Dubonnet of the famed Dubonnet wine family. That she began to think of Lauren as Aly's light of love all during her absence is more than a probability. As disturbing as this was, there were even further upsetting developments. She was no sooner back as mistress of Aly's Paris villa (as well as a dozen other chateaus and country places he owns) when the house began filling up with his friends—mostly English, mostly of the “horsey” type with whom Rita has so little in common that a pact of mutual disregard has long been honored between them.

Aly and his friends talked horses. Rita read, went shopping, posed once on their balcony with the grinning Aly the time he asked the photographers, “You mean like Romeo and Juliet?”—and was thoroughly bored and disappointed. And she was terribly alone. As a matter of fact, a friend of Aly who, like him, spends a good many late afternoons at the Traveler's Club and saw him very often there just about this period, circulated a story that had Paris snickering. “Aly has deliberately surrounded himself with a lot of people because he doesn't want to be too much alone with Rita,” he said. This sort of revelation triggered a lot of suppositions in the minds of Parisians, not all in Aly's favor either, as the French can be quite objective in their thinking. They picture Aly as having played the role of a husband with open arms only to solidify his case and weaken hers—meaning that Aly was being practical, was not overlooking the financial settlement that must always be a factor if he and Rita come to the divorce stage. This, it is pointed out, stacks the cards against Rita completely. On the surface there is a husbandly welcome but underneath it's not so cozy.

PARIS, when you are in love, can be inspiring. Paris, when your love is a question mark, and when there is no surge of romance to counterbalance the fall chill and the rain sweeping in from the north and west, as it did steadily during this period, can be terribly dreary. Perhaps this was why Rita headed south to warm Spain when she left. And it must have been heartening when an admirer welcomed her in Madrid with a bouquet of flowers. She told Spanish reporters that not even her closest friends knew she had left Paris. This was in a sense a pathetic remark; Rita had no close friends in Paris. She was accused of holding herself aloof, of not even trying to perfect her French, which she says is “pretty good” and the French say is “pretty poor.”

She made no statement directly when she left France but adopted a diplomatic stratagem and appointed a “spokesman” who talked to an English reporter from the London Daily Mail. “Rita and Aly disagreed over the extent of the independence each would retain in resuming their married life together,” said the spokesman (who might well be Rita herself). “Both have public responsibilities and they hoped to find a way of life that would take that into account, allowing each to keep their necessary independence and yet remain husband and wife. At present the position is vague, and it is impossible to say what decision will be taken. The couple was sincere in their desire for a reconciliation, as revealed at their press conference. But even then everything had not been settled, as shown by Miss Hayworth's insistence that she did not for the present intend to proceed with a divorce.”

The same story, when it ran in the Mail, also said that Aly had seen his lawyer, ostensibly about business connected with his racing stable but also to discuss the marriage. When lovers, or parted couples, run to their lawyers at the first hint of trouble, it is usually a sign of a fight to the finish. A woman who knows Aly well summed up Rita's chances for happiness as follows: “It really is rather sad to think of that poor girl trying to dictate terms to someone as powerful and clever as Aly and his family . . . because believe me, she hasn't a prayer.”

This is probably true, if you believe general opinion here. But this doesn't darken Rita's future by any means. It may be lightening right now . . . if Bob Savage, a former lieutenant colonel in the American Air Force and now New York café singer, has his way. It was known in Paris that he sought Rita's favor in Beverly Hills where he met her, and it was only because a reconciliation between her and Aly seemed imminent that he retired from the scene. With the first report that she and Aly had broken again he took off for Europe.

BUT perhaps the best analysis of Rita's decision not to stay with Aly was given by an American writer familiar with the story. “I think every woman in the world ought to bless her for it,” he said. “She earnestly tried to make a go of it with the father of her child. But she had to walk out in all honesty. Aly wanted a wife, all right, but not one at his side . . . just in the convenient background. Aly wanted her beauty, but not as an inspiration to him, just to grace his household. Aly wanted the respectability of marriage—it's a necessity for him politically and, you might say, economically—but little of the responsibility. A lot of women come to this realization about their husbands and do nothing about it. Rita, at 34, if not before, knew that this is not what she wanted. She sensed that in the enlightened portions of the world a wife who does not fight to maintain the marital emancipation women have won is betraying all of them. Being Rita she wouldn't, she couldn't, stand for it.”

Heston didn't always give the impression of power. As a boy he was a runt, an undersized featherweight, and stayed that way until high school. Then he grew eight inches in two years, then gained weight during his stint with the army, after college. He grew up in the wilds of Michigan, a life that was almost an inheritance, for his grandfather had once owned thousands of acres of timberland. The family, although well educated, had for years lived the remote life of the woodsman, and Heston was born there in 1923 to follow for a while in the footsteps of his predecessors. Until the family moved to Chicago in 1933, his boyhood was the richest that can be experienced. He swam in the rivers, fished in the lakes, and hunted in the forests, and before he was knee-high to his father he was fairly expert with the rod and gun and axe and all the tools by which outdoor men live. To this day he hunts only to eat, and pioneer-like, disdains the act of hunting for the mere sport of it, feeling that hunger is the only reason strong enough for the act of killing.

As the area where he lived had few children and was populated mostly by lumberjacks, Heston lived the early part of his life like a small lone wolf, with few companions of his own age. There was no one with whom to pretend, and he early began using his imagination, creating his own world peopled with imaginary characters. Sundown would find the small boy, his chores at home finished, off in the forest playing with scores of cowboys, robbers and Indians but no one but himself could see.

It was the beginning of his interest in acting, and when the Hestons moved to Chicago he was delighted to at last have other boys around him, kids who could play parts in the melodramas he had been playing solo for so long.

It wasn't easy at first, this move from the big outdoors to the big city. It was weeks before he could cross the heavily trafficked streets without fear and before he could feel at home with the other kids on the block. He realized for the first time how much shorter and slimmer he was than other boys his own age, and it bothered him. He had always wanted to be big some day, big like his father and the other lumbermen, and now to know that he was smaller even than his classmates was a blow.

HIS name made another strike against him. “Charlton,” the other boys would sneer, and shrug their shoulders in disgust. The first day in school, the huge school whose classrooms were spilling over with more children than he had ever seen, the teacher called the roll. “Charlotte Heston!” she said, and no one answered. The small Mr. Heston scrunched down behind his desk, his ears flaming red with embarrassment. “Charlotte Heston!” repeated the teacher. “Where is the little Heston girl?” That did it, of course, and his classmates didn't forget it in a hurry. There were a few snide remarks made, but Charlton, despite his diminutive size, could use his fists as well if not better than the city boys, and soon his new-found friends were calling him Chuck and joining with him in his own brand of fun.

He was not only already an actor at ten years of age; he was a director and writer as well. “You guys come to get me, see,” he'd say, “and you don't know I have a gun. But I got one from Joe when he came to see me at the jail. So you've got to look real surprised when I all of a sudden pull it out of my shoulder holster.”

It went on that way, first on the streets after school, then later in school plays. When Chuck learned that New Trier High School in Winnetka offered the best dramatic training of any public school in the country, he enrolled immediately. He excelled from the first in stage designing, management and diction. After graduation he attended Northwestern University's School of Speech. It was there he met Lydia Clarke, another student of the theater. They were married just before his induction into the army.

The first year was certainly the hardest. They lived out of a foot locker, moving from camp to camp, before Chuck was sent to the Aleutians. Lydia had to wait two years to cook their first meal, and four years before they had a room that could honestly be called a kitchen. They lived in shabby hotel rooms and boarding houses while Chuck tried to get a start on Broadway. For almost one whole year Lydia's modeling brought in the lion's share of the Heston income.

Chuck didn't like being broke. “Maybe if I were Bohemian,” he says, “I could enjoy that kind of living. But when an actor's broke it means he isn't working, and an actor out of work is a sorry character.” They never went into debt, but there was many a night when the mere sight of the ever-present dish of noodles was enough to make them despair.

Things grew brighter as the years passed. Heston had worked in radio soap operas, out of necessity rather than choice, and the radio experience led naturally into television. After two Broadway seasons and a busy summer of stock in 1948, Chuck landed a role in television's “Studio 1.” 83

Worthington Miner, the show's producer, saw great talent in the new actor and henceforth gave him plush leading roles in many distinguished productions, including Jane Eyre, Of Human Bondage and Shadow And Substance. Audience reaction was immediate, and fan mail began flooding the studio. Macbeth drew an astounding number of letters, a fact about which Heston, whose highest ambition is Shakespearean drama, felt quite warmly. "The unlikeliest people wrote, people from tiny little towns—people whom you wouldn't suspect of being interested in Shakespeare."

THE interest spread to Hollywood, and producer Hal Wallis was the man successful in signing Heston to a contract. There had been nibbles from Hollywood prior to Wallis' offer and Chuck, with three mediums already conquered, gave it much serious thought. He preferred to remain in New York to be near the stage and television center, yet he came to the conclusion that it's impossible for an actor to get beyond a certain point without doing films. "As a matter of fact," he says, "I suppose you could say that there hasn't been a star made in the last dozen years who hasn't made at least one picture."

He and Lydia came to Hollywood and rented a two-and-a-half room apartment, "bigger than our place in New York." The place in New York is a cold water flat, which they still maintain, because Heston is one of the few Hollywood actors having studio permission to work also in television. They live from coast to coast, still packing the traveling irons and traveling clocks collected during their marriage, and in each apartment Chuck bumps into the walls at every turn. He likes big rooms but has learned to adjust to small spaces.

"When we buy our house," he says, "the first thing on the purchase list is an eight-by-eight mattress. I'm tired of tucking my toes over the end of the skimpy thing we have now."

When he feels a need for stretching he and Lydia go back to Michigan, where Chuck owns 1280 acres of forest land. It is their one luxury in life, and a personal triumph for Chuck, because after years of saving, he managed to purchase a part of the huge lands that the family sold years ago. There is a large house, a machine shed, a lake over a mile wide, hundreds of bears, deer, and even a pair of golden eagles. It is his country, big and rugged; the winter temperature often dips way below zero, but this is where Heston developed the healthy body that has since grown into such an immense frame. He's used to it, he loves it, this is the only place where he can really relax. It is their vacation spot whenever there's a let-up in their busy schedules. "Think of it," says Chuck. "There isn't a telephone in the house." There has been little time for Michigan, however. Heston, whose latest film is Pony Express, has been too busy.

WHILE he has the ability to play hero or heel with equal conviction, he is most at home in the type of role that portrays him as a rugged Romeo . . . the Heathcliff of Wuthering Heights with his deep intensity, the Rochester of Jane Eyre with his hint of brutality, and in movies the Brad of The Greatest Show On Earth. The role of Brad, says Chuck, was the most comfortable of his career, the more so because Cecil B. DeMille altered the character to fit him even more snugly. Brad, if you will remember, was the circus manager, the strong and silent type who wore his hat rakishly on the back of his head, who ran the circus, including the 84 heroine Betty Hutton, with an iron glove.

Charlton himself does not understand why his admirers consider him the rugged type. He feels he is just an average guy and fails to see, despite all his psychological self-probing, that his appeal stems from the very fact that he is, underneath, like Brad. He is a big man, two inches over six feet, and a few pounds more than two hundred. His chest measures 44 inches; and expanded, increases to 48, one of the biggest even in Hollywood, land of barrel-chested bruisers.

HIS fans particularly notice the masculine quality of his voice. Although his diction leaves nothing to be desired, the voice itself has rough edges, a gruff quality that seemingly delights the distaff side of America. It often gets away from him, and without realizing it, he booms his pear-shaped tones until they bounce from wall to wall of whatever room he may be in. On these occasions Lydia lays a hand gently on his arm. "Dear, you're projecting too much."

"It's a good thing," Charlton Heston once remarked, "that I married a girl like Lydia even though she does say I'm a Great Dane on a leash. I can't stand stupid women, and Lydia is not only bright; she also knows what I'm talking about when I talk shop."

I SAW IT HAPPEN

While in Gloucester, Massachusetts, during the summer of 1949, I attended a carnival on the 4th of July. I noticed a long chauffeur-driven car come into the parking lot and thought this was a little unusual.

There in a few minutes, I saw a large crowd watching a young mother and her child on the horses at the merry-go-round. Someone said, "It's Judy Garland and Liza."

When the merry-go-round stopped, Judy took Liza around to some of the other amusements. The crowd kept following them but nobody asked for an autograph as they realized at the time she was recuperating from a nervous breakdown.

When he can be touted away from his favorite subject, he is every bit as articulate in other fields. Despite the Hestons' preoccupation with their profession, more than half of their close friends have never been backstage, and their mutual interests run the gamut from politics to a new recipe for snails.

They get along fine, and there's little reason why they shouldn't. Lydia is the perfect helpmeet for Chuck, going over his scripts with him and playing the assorted parts related to his own. She likes good food, as he does, but will never be able to consume the same quantities. He is a prodigious eater, and one night when dining at the home of friends, ate seven steaks. "Not exactly the way to win friends or get invited again," he says. He claims he did it sort of unconsciously; two at the table; then later in the kitchen, talking with his host, the remaining five that were still on the platter disappeared during the confab.

"That's what I mean about having a Great Dane on a leash," says Lydia. "He's overgrown, and every once in a while he just wanders off and needs a tug on the leash. He gets distracted easily and does things in an absent-minded fashion. He keeps things in his closet for years, and it never occurs to him that they left this world years ago. I have to keep throwing out or giving away his clothes and if it happens to be some tweedy old favorite of his he pretends he's angry. But he really isn't. He doesn't even have a temper—he's almost phlegmatic. But," she amends, "he's really easy to live with. He's like a chameleon—can adapt himself to whatever type of person he's with. And he has such tremendous energy. Charlie never gets tired."

She's the world's only resident who can call him Charlie and get away with it. Chuck claims she gives the name "a special kind of reading," a special something that makes it bearable to him. They blend their careers perfectly. Never criticizing until a performance is over, and then giving and taking constructive remarks with even temper—and sometimes teasing each other.

Lydia once saw a movie film taken of Chuck when he was a boy. "He was pretending, as usual. Climbing over em-bankments and shooting at thin air. What a ham!"

Now, he can't remember when he didn't want to be an actor. When he was in high school and his mother suggested dancing lessons he was too engrossed in his theater studies to take the time. So that when the night arrived for the senior ball he didn't attend. But rather than tell his parents, spent the night walking along the beach by himself, encased in his tuxedo.

THERE never was any girl but Lydia. Chuck married when he was 20, and now when he meets a woman he looks first at her eyes. If they show intelligence, he settles down comfortably for a long conversation. It goes something like this:

"I like stage work best. I suppose because it's there the actor has the greatest responsibility. Movies are a visual thing, and the camera and director can do almost anything without an actor. . . . I like actors who are professional people, the actors who know the importance of being prompt and of knowing their lines. . . . Playing characters of Henry James was difficult for me. His heroes don't act like I do, don't think like I do. It was hard work, but it was good for me. And then the parts in Claudia, in Voice Of The Turtle—those men are too gentle. I'm not that way. But you see, the greatest advantage an actor can have is the kind of parts that don't fit him. He has to work. You kind of have to stretch different muscles all the time. The same goes for working in all kinds of mediums. . . . I like to paint because when I paint I don't have to be good. I can relax and do something bad if I want to. All the arts are allied. The same qualities are necessary, the sense of timing, the mental concentration, the selectivity. But most of all, the power of observation. Acting is a visual art. I'm a visual thinker. When you say the word 'father' I think of a pair of legs encased in leather boots, with the firelight shining on them. That's the way it used to be back in Michigan. . . . I think anybody who can write a good play is wonderful. Play writing takes everything in the book, and there's no pleasure greater for me than doing a good play. . . ."

This is shop talk, pure and simple. But there aren't many women who, if they have intelligent eyes and can garner this much attention, would really object to being Charlton Heston's audience for the subject closest to his heart. After all, he is a ruddy hunk of man.

Here's the truth about the stars—as you asked for it. Want to spike more rumors? Want more facts? Write to THE INSIDE STORY, Modern Screen, 1046 N. Carol Drive, Hollywood, Cal.

Q. Can you tell me please how many times Dale Robertson has been married?
—J. J., OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.

A. Twice.

Q. Isn't the Dean Martin marriage going to pieces?
—D. E., AKRON, OHIO.

A. No.

Q. Can you find out how much money Gary Cooper will make from High Noon?
—E. R., CHICAGO, ILL.

A. Cooper's salary is $100,000 and 20% of the net profits. His take from High Noon will approximate $360,000.

Q. Will Dan Dailey reconcile with his former wife?
—H. Y., NASHVILLE, TENN.

A. It is doubtful.

Q. Is there any possibility that Bing Crosby will now marry Ann Blyth, especially since they are both Catholics?
—D. U., NEW YORK, N.Y.

A. A rumor in bad taste and without foundation.

Q. I understand Bob Hope is worth four million dollars. If this is true, why does he want to buy oil wells, TV stations, and other enterprises?
—H. Y., TOLEDO, OHIO.

A. That is his approximate worth. His youth was so poverty-ridden that one of his great passions in life has always been the acquisition of money; another is giving thousands to charity.

Q. Is it true that Betty Grable refuses to speak to Marilyn Monroe because of jealousy?
—T. E., SANTA FE, N.M.

A. Grable and Monroe are on speaking terms.

Q. I've been told that Rock Hudson is being given a big build-up by Universal because the studio is sore at Tony Curtis. Is that true?
—C. E., MOLINE, ILL.

A. It was at one point, is no longer.

Q. What is Marilyn Monroe's salary and how much does 20th Century-Fox get for her on a loanout?
—I. Y., DENNIS, MASS.

A. Marilyn's salary is $750 per week; 20th currently is not loaning her out.

If they did the asking price would be $100,000 per picture.

Q. Wasn't the John Wayne divorce proceeding soft-pedaled because of all the dirty linen in the case?
—B. Y., ITHACA, N.Y.

A. Yes.

Q. I've been told that ever since that riotous Marion Davies party in which she fought with Fernando Lamas, Lana Turner has been referred to by her friends as "the human punching bag." Is this true?

A. A few of Miss Turner's friends have described her thusly.

Q. I understand that Doris Day has refused to act in any more pictures with Danny Thomas. Has Danny become stuck-up?
—E. R., TOLEDO, OHIO.

A. Just convinced of his potential as a dramatic star.

Q. Isn't the Ty Power-Linda Christian marriage finished to all intents and purposes?
—D. W., DENVER, COL.

A. Both sophisticated partners have an understanding which should keep the marriage going.

LOUELLA PARSONS' GOOD NEWS

A HAPPY NEW YEAR to you, one and all—bit belated but not the less heartfelt.

This is the time of the year I usually make a few predictions of things to come in Hollywood—and so let's tee-off with a few:

I doubt if Arlene Dahl and Fernando Lamas will marry despite the heat they're generating romantically at the present time. I have Lamas down in my book as not a marryin' man.

The Gregory Pecks won't part no matter how strong the rumors from Europe that they are quarreling.

Two Academy Award nominees for the "best Actress" Oscar will be Shirley Booth (Come Back, Little Sheba) and Julie Harris (Member Of The Wedding).

Debbie Reynolds and Bob Wagner WON'T make up their quarrel.

Newcomers to shine the brightest in 1953—Rosemary Clooney, Peggy Lee, Audrey Hepburn, Jeff Hunter, Aldo Ray, Dewey Martin and Anna Maria Alberghetti.

Gossip writers persistently trying to tie up Bing Crosby in romances which he won't be having.

East Of Eden the most discussed and cussed picture since casting Gone With The Wind.

Marilyn Monroe's jump in salary from $500 per week to an eventual $6000 per week (which isn't a prediction—the new deal is coming up 'for Marilyn).

No marriage for Lana Turner.

IT'S also a little late to be talking about Christmas presents, but I know I'm always interested in who gets what—and perhaps you haven't heard about these:

Lana Turner gave little Cheryl a small "set chair"—a duplicate of the one Lana uses when she's working.

Deborah Kerr gave her family the order for a swimming pool and the family gave Deborah three beautiful Suzy sports outfits.

Ava Gardner sent beautiful ivory gifts from Africa to her Hollywood pals.

The Gene Kellys loaded their friends with French perfume.

Another swimming pool gift—Liz Taylor and Mike Wilding gave each other the pool for their new home.

Van Johnson gave Evie an oil painting of their daughter Schuyler—a lovely picture by artist John Morris.

Ricardo Montalban's gift to Georgianna—an exquisite antique bracelet encrusted in semi-precious stones.

And, perhaps, the nicest surprise of all—George Hormel surprised Leslie Caron by bringing her parents, the Claude Carons, here from Paris to spend the holidays with their daughter.

MY 'phone rang at a very late hour and a nasal, muffled voice said softly:

"This is Marlon Brando. I've just married Movita. I'm drunk—but I wanted you to know the news!"

Ordinarily, I'd have been on the telephone immediately to my paper with this "scoop"—but I haven't been in the "scoops" business all these years without developing a sixth sense about these things.

I'm glad I listened to my feminine intuition. Sure enough, my midnight caller turned out to be an impostor pretending to be Brando and trying to get me to fall for this phony story.

Marlon, highly indignant, knows who this man is—and if he dares to repeat the hoax, will take police action.

FERNANDO LAMAS' little habit of letting ladies pick up the check at cafes and nightclubs has the town gasping. A South American habit, maybe? (Continued on page 8)

PARTY OF THE MONTH: THE SURPRISE SHINDIG CLARK GABLE THREW FOR THE SINATRAS . . . A "PROFILE" OF

Janet Leigh's leggy figure was shown off to advantage in the costume she wore to the annual Masquer's Ball in Hollywood recently.

And Jan Sterling was a close rival for honors in the gargeous gam department, at the same gala Ball. Jan came with hubby Paul Douglas.

Mike O'Shea ran the danger of being tickled to death if he got too close to his featherbedecked wife, Virginia Mayo, that night.

Ursula Thiess and Bob Taylor look happy together here, but why was she crying, waiting for him in his car alone a few nights before this?

MARILYN MONROE... MARRIAGE HAS CHANGED JANE WYMAN... MICKEY ROONEY'S HONEYMOON BEHAVIOR...

Debra Paget's mother is never far behind when her beautiful daughter goes stepping. Debra's the gal who's never been kissed, except on the cheek, and she wants to keep it that way (for a while, at least!).

Charming new bride Jane Wyman wore a demure checked gingham bonnet and skirt to the Masquer's Ball . . . but her skirt stopped short way above the knee, and Janie held her own with the rest of the glamor girls.

LOUELLA PARSONS' good news

One of his friends explains that, of course, Fernie permits his date to pick up the tariff ONLY when he has been invited. When he does the inviting, he pays.

Anyway, it looks awful.

Sight and Sound in the Night: Ursula Thiess, parked in Bob Taylor's car outside the Mocambo, weeping quietly to herself.

But when he swung in behind the wheel, she had the powder puff out, drying the traces.

A honeymoon story to end all honeymoon stories is that when Mickey Rooney and his bride, Elaine Mahnken, checked into the El Rancho Hotel a few hours after their elopement to Las Vegas, they asked for SLEEPING PILLS! !? ? ? ?

AVA GARDNER and Frank Sinatra spent their first wedding anniversary 18,000 feet up in the air and 10,000 miles from home winging their way to Nairobi where Ava was due to start Mogambo.

"We felt kinda sorry for ourselves" Frankie reports, "But we exchanged our gifts and opened a not-too-chilled bottle of champagne to toast our first milestone."

His gift to Ava was a huge globe-shaped ring studded with diamond chips. She gave him a thin platinum wrist watch.

When they arrived in Nairobi the night of their anniversary, it was pleasant to be met at the plane by Clark Gable and director John Ford and the rest of the Hollywood troupe.

They were surprised when Clark told them to dress for dinner. "It's the custom at the new Stanley Hotel here," Clark said.

And, it wasn't until they entered the dining room that night, and the African orchestra struck up the chords of "The Anniversary Waltz", that Frankie and Ava realized that their wedding date had not been forgotten and that they were guests of honor at a big party hosted by Gable.

Ava got very sentimental and cried and told Clark she didn't think anyone would think to celebrate their anniversary (even if he knew about it), because they'd had so many battles during their short marriage nobody would know whether they'd be speaking or not.

Ten days later, Frankie had to fly back to Hollywood to rest for From Here To Eternity and it will be a long time before he sees Ava again.

But, he'll never forget Clark Gable's gesture of friendship and the happiness that shone in the eyes of his bride when she realized their anniversary hadn't been forgotten—and good friends made it gay and warm and memorable for both of them with all the trimmings, including a cake.

THE night the William Goetzes gave a dinner honoring Gene Markey and his charming bride (the former Mrs. Lucille Wright, owner of the Calumet racing stable) was the evening Jane Wyman and Freddie Karger elected to elope, so I spent most of my time at the telephone waiting for their call.

However, it was a very gay party. Jimmy Stewart was at the piano singing some of his favorite tunes; Loretta Young did a dance; George Burns, who will sing at the drop of a hint, gave with number after number in his off-key style. And, Deborah Kerr, the most ladylike girl in Hollywood, seemed to be having the best time of all just sitting quietly on the sidelines and looking on.

Jack Benny's toast to the guests of honor was very amusing and ditto for Bill Goetz' to Joan Fontaine and Collier Young, also newlyweds.

PERSONAL OPINIONS: I'm fed up with the feuding of Corinne Calvet and Zsa Zsa Gabor. How about you? . . . His friends are worried about Red Skelton, who isn't taking the best care of his career, his marriage or his health. Nothing is worth getting the shakes about, Red. . . I just wonder if Ginger Rogers will be as happy (if she marries 24-year-old Jacques du Bergerac) as she thinks she will? . . . Isn't blonde, doll-faced Jane Powell well on her way to being a baby Hetty Greene of Hollywood? She already owns two eighteen-unit apartment buildings in the San Fernando Valley, has an interest in a cleaning establishment and has bought acreage to subdivide for small homes . . . Hedy Lamarr should grab herself a movie job—but quickly. She's turning down every script offered to her—and some of them are good. If she isn't careful, she'll "neurotize" herself right out of a career. . . . If any actor's wife pays more for her clothes than Mrs. Van Johnson, will she please hold up her hand and be counted. Rumor has it that some of Evie's Rontana gowns cost as much as $1500 apiece. . . . Who did Dale Robertson think he was kidding when he said he and his wife had never been separated. What does he call moving out of his home, refusing to answer Mrs. R's telephone calls, and staying away for two weeks . . . Isn't the real reason Debbie Reynolds called off her romance with Bob Wagner was because of all the publicity he received dating Barbara Stanwyck. Me thinks so.

THE big social events of the month have been charity dinners and the wonderful tribute paid Louis B. Mayer by the Producers Guild at a whopping banquet in the Biltmore Bowl.

I can't remember seeing more beautiful gowns at any event. Our beauties were really done to the teeth.

Jeanne Crain looked like something right out of heaven in an apple green bouffant satin with a slightly deeper shade of green tulle scarf billowing to the floor.

I overheard Betty Furness (a looker herself) say, when she spotted Jeanne, "If I looked like Jeanne Crain I'd stay home all day and just look at myself in different mirrors!" You're welcome, Jeanne.

Ann Blyth (she was Harriet Parsons' guest and sat at our table) wore daintily beaded pink satin, the new above-the-ankle-length for formals, and she, too, was encircled by a pink tulle stole.

Gracie Allen's gown was made of baby lace and white net, yards and yards of it, with enormous puff sleeves.

A sheath of "winter white" satin was chosen by Esther Williams and it fit her as tightly as one of her swimming suits. Why not—if you've got a shape like Esther's?

One of the few black gowns (most of the gals went pastel satin with a vengeance) was worn by Norma Shearer, the only woman sitting on the dais. The former star wore black velvet with pearls and when she put on her glasses to read parts of her speech, I jotted down a fashion note for gals who wear glasses:

Norma's glass-rims were studded with pearls and brilliants—very becoming.

My Janie Wyman said, "Darling, we can't come to the City of Hope dinner with you Sunday night, because Freddie is playing a date in Pasadena that evening—and I'm sittin' home waiting for him."

This, mind you, from the former "going-out" gal in our town, the belle who just couldn't stay home, even when she was dead tired, and who sought out her favorite jive artists almost nightly!

What a change in Jane! And how very well her sudden and surprising (even to her best friends) marriage to bandleader Freddie Karger is working out.

Recently, I danced past Freddie's bandstand when he was playing the Jimmy McHugh Polio Foundation costume party in Palm Springs. "Where's your bride?" I asked Karger as I danced by.

"Home with the children," he laughed, "mine and hers."

What Freddie meant is that his 11-year-old daughter, Terry, was with Jane and her two, Maureen and Michael. "Terry and Maureen are just two years separated," Freddie said. "They are already close friends—and of course, Terry loves Jane." He added proudly, "Who doesn't?"

There's no problem about Terry's spending much time with her glamorous new stepmother and her father. Freddie's former wife is a successful woman lawyer, very busy, and she is glad that the little girl has found such a wonderful "ready made" family to visit when she isn't with her real mother.

JEAN SIMMONS got the giggles something awful, playing the first love scene with her swashbuckler-husband, Stewart Granger, in Young Bess.

She broke Granger up, too, and finally, when she got around to making an embarrassed explanation to the more or less irritated members of the cast and crew, Jean said:

"There are a couple of lines in the dialogue that strike us funny because they have a very private meaning to us as married people. We're sorry. Let's do the scene over."

Many fans have the idea that Young Bess is the first picture Jean and Stewart have ever made together. T'aint so.

Several years ago they did Adam and Evelyn together in London. "But we weren't married then," explained Jean.

"It isn't easy to work with your real-life husband," she sighed. "Having people on the set watching us is as though, on a quiet evening at home together, we left the shades up!"

INTIMATE Tidbits About That Delectable Dish, Marilyn Monroe: She would rather eat hors d'oeuvres than dinner—her favorites being tiny tomatoes stuffed with cream cheese and caviar. . . .

Unless she's actually in front of a camera, her hair never looks well combed. It's fine and it snarls and it hurts her to comb it. . . .

She used to say, "Between you and I" and is grateful that someone corrected her that it is right to say "Between you and me." Now

If you're neglecting dry skin... watch out!

BEAUTY AUTHORITY

I am always amazed at some women. They spend hours nursing plants, exclaim with horror if a begonia wilts. But these same women do nothing to keep their own dry skin from getting thirstier, flakier, more withered... and just plain wrinkled.

If you're neglecting dry skin, let me caution you...you're adding years to your face! Perhaps you think skin care is expensive, time-consuming? Well, there is a dry skin care that costs pennies, takes less than five minutes a day, and will make you look like a new woman!

I'm talking about Woodbury Dry Skin Cream, with its amazing new penetrating ingredient, Penaten! Penaten carries the lanolin and other rich softening oils in the cream deep into the important corneum layer of your skin.

While many creams just stay on the surface of your skin, Woodbury penetrates — so quickly — five minutes' care is all you need!

here's a simple routine
I recommend:

With your fingertips, cream this rich Woodbury Dry Skin Cream in tiny circles about your eyes, nose and mouth, over your cheeks and forehead. With firm upward strokes, work the cream over your throat and neck. Leave it on for five minutes, then... tissue off!

Dry lines and rough flakes will be gone. You'll notice a fresh new bloom in your face, and others will notice it too! Try Woodbury Dry Skin Cream. It costs only 25¢ to 97¢, plus tax. The results are priceless.

MOVIE REVIEWS

picture of the month

Ray Bolger and Doris Day sing and dance their way into each other's hearts on the way to Paris.

APRIL IN PARIS

■ A gay and original story idea, just the right light touch in the direction and the lightning feet and lanky frame of Ray Bolger make a fine prescription for a movie musical. Add a dash of Gallic whimsy in the person of Claude Dauphin and a part tailored to the talents of Doris Day, and you have just what the play-doctor ordered: an offbeat song-and-dance show that seldom takes itself seriously. How could it, with Bolger playing an assistant secretary to the secretary to the Under-secretary of State? The story gets off to a hilarious start when Bolger lovingly plans an international festival of the arts in Paris, a project he feels sure will spread the fame of the U. S.—and the name of Bolger—throughout the world. But he makes one frightful error. Misaddressing a letter intended to invite Ethel Barrymore to be an American representative at the fete, he sends it instead to one Ethel (Dynamite) Jackson, a Broadway chorus cutie played by Miss Day, who accepts. There is a lot of explaining to do. Dynamite naturally explodes and Bolger's problems multiply. Unexpectedly the selection of a chorus girl to represent the U. S. in Paris is hailed by press and public alike as a stroke of sheer genius. But now Dynamite is adamant in her refusal to go, and all Bolger's powers of persuasion are called upon in his efforts to make her board the ship. She falls for his sales talk, and he falls for her. The rest of the action takes place mostly on shipboard and features some comical contrasts between the entertainer's honesty and the State Department staff's stuffiness. In addition, there is a spur-of-the-moment, mid-night marriage for Doris and Ray, but unbeknownst to them it is, not binding (a thieving busboy, stealing liquor from the captain's cabin, assumes the latter's identity and pretends to perform the ceremony). From here on in, April in Paris substitutes farce for satire and loses some of its champagne sparkle, though by no means all of its punch. The sophisticated effect grows thin at the finish, but to the end the film is good fun and the singing and dancing top-notch.—Warners

"I soothed my husband with sandpaper!"

"Nobody'd ever call Paul Douglas a meek husband," Jan Sterling explains, "and he was pretty irate at the 'junk' I picked up at auctions... that is, until I showed him how lovely it was underneath."

"Then he admitted all the sanding and scraping was worth while. But, oh, what it did to my hands! And what a relief it was afterwards to smooth on soothing Jergens Lotion!"

"We worked like beavers getting settled and unpacking barrels filled with scratchy excelsior. Again I blessed Jergens. It works so fast! See for yourself why: Smooth one hand with quickly absorbed Jergens..."

"Apply ordinary lotion or cream to the other. Wet them. Water won't 'bead' on the hand smoothed with Jergens Lotion as it will with an oily care."

"My hands are always smooth and soft for close-ups with my favorite leading man." No wonder Jergens Lotion is preferred by screen stars 7 to 1!

Use Jergens Lotion to keep your hands lovely, too. See why it's the hand care used by more women than any other in the world. 10¢ to $1.00, plus tax.

ANDROCLES AND THE LION

Although the story is about a group of Christian martyrs-to-be in the time of Caesar, Androcles And The Lion is one of George Bernard Shaw's gentlest jests. There is a lot of bite to some of its lines but little to its lion. The real violence is all off stage. Shaw purposely bypasses the legitimately tragic scenes the period would permit him, for his purpose is high comedy rather than historical drama, and the ultimate, rather than the historical truth. Androcles (Alan Young), a devoutly Christian tailor, flees to the hills from Rome to avoid being sacrificed in the Colosseum. Androcles' flight is hardly escape, for his ever-nagging wife is with him. But real freedom comes when Androcles meets a moaning lion and removes a thorn from the paw of the thankful beast—an animal he is fated to meet again. Fear frustrating her wifely disapproval, the wife disappears. That means that Androcles can be captured quietly by Roman soldiers who have been searching for him and rest secure in the Christian comradeship of his fellow runaways. This little irony helps to set the scene: a group of psalm-singing martyrs on their way to death in the arena at Rome. One of Androcles new-found friends is Ferrovius (Robert Newton), an ill-tempered giant who has discovered peace in abstinence from violence, and who tests his self-restraint by almost breaking people's backs. Another is Lavinia (Jean Simmons), a lovely, lonely aristocrat who has found in simple-hearted faith an answer to all her doubts and fears. She tests herself by almost breaking a Roman captain's heart. The captain (Victor Mature) loves Lavinia and argues with her philosophically but always seems to know he cannot win. And so it goes: Nobody can win but Shaw himself and, in this particular example of his whimsy, the most docilely humble of human creatures. All this is Shaw in his most deliciously playful mood, but Androcles demands delicately balanced screen adapting, playing and direction. The film version is sorely lacking in these elements. Some of Shaw's best lines have been cut, truncated or completely reshaped. Thus Shaw leads up to his points but is never allowed really to make them. Worse still, the actors make points the playwright surely never had in mind. In styles of acting they run the gamut from Young's very quiet, very American kind of comedy (so effectively shy but not sly enough for Shaw) to Evans' very posturing, very British way of throwing away some of Shaw's best lines. In between—and much more effective—are the sweet but sharp delivery of Miss Simmons and the romantic but mettlesome portrayal of Mature. But only Alan Mowbray really makes the most of his role. Playing one of those Shavian commentators that actors de-happy in his lines, half cynical Shaw, deriding them.

Cast: Jean Simmons, Victor Mature, Robert Newton, Alan Young, Maurice Evans, Alan Mowbray.—RKO.

MILLION DOLLAR MERMAID

Esther Williams was born to play Annette Kellerman, the famed Australian swimmer and feminist, and finally she has. In justice to Miss Kellerman, however, it is necessary to point out that this film biography doesn't quite fill the bill. This is not Miss Williams' fault. No performer and part were ever better fitted for one another, for Annette was the Esther of her day, and the latter fills the role as well as the former's famous one-piece bathing suit. But Annette's story was one of fight, fight for her rights, and in the present script no human being emerges from her suit to justify this attitude. Except in the picture's opening sequence (in which Donna Cocoran effectively acts the role of the 10-year-old Annette, whose emaciated legs are encased in iron braces but whose spirit soars above them), the swimmer is shown as a gentlewoman of charm, breeding and retiring nature, not the girl from Down Under with iron determination. According to Million Dollar Mermaid, financial troubles cause the Kellerman family, consisting of Annette and her music-teacher father (Walter Pidgeon), to emigrate to England. On the boat they meet a smooth promoter (Victor Mature), who promises them the sky. When things don't work out for them in the old country, they have to ask him for it. He tells them it's in America. There, Annette's single-piece bathing costume becomes the scandal of an even-then easily scandalized Boston. But notoriety skyrockets her to fame and leaves her boy friend far behind. Determined to make good on his own, he disappears. Rapidly the screen story scans the Kellermans' life: She becomes the N. Y. Hippodrome's biggest hit, her father the orchestra conductor there. But always there is the pull at the heart, the thought of the true love behind all those promotion stunts. So Annette seeks her man out and wins him back when, through a tragedy, her high-water days are ended. Fans may find Million Dollar Mermaid as entertaining as most Esther Williams shows. The swimming and diving are phenomenal, the film is photographically fine. Since this is, in a sense, however, Esther Williams' story as well as Miss Kellerman's, it's sad that it doesn't have more point, more portraiture. In its screening, the power behind the Australian crawl has been lost.

Cast: Esther Williams, Victor Mature, Walter Pidgeon.—MGM.

THUNDER IN THE EAST

This exotic item features two really fine performances: by Charles Boyer as the thoughtful, Nehru-like prime minister of an Indian border state, and Deborah Kerr, as a beautiful blind British colonist. Fewer compliments can be paid the rest of the cast, and none the story. It tells how Alan Ladd, as a brash American munitions runner, arrives at the tiny mountain principality, his plane stocked with guns to sell to the government, which is threatened by a horde of savage rebels who have been sacking the countryside. Ladd finds, however, that Boyer, the state's real ruler (its weak, wealthy maharajah soon flees with his fortune), is an advocate of non-violence. Boyer impounds his guns. Infuriated, Ladd sees how he can make a few bucks after all. He proposes to fly the British colony out of the embattled city, but at a price. Enraged again when Miss Kerr, with whom he is in love, accuses him of trying to make money out of others' misery, he tries to take off by himself, but airfield guards shoot his plane down. Escaping from the flames, Ladd makes plans anew and finally arranges for another plane to arrive from Bombay and take all the women away. Miss Kerr, however, won't go, and at the final moment Ladd decides he would rather stay and die by her side than leave her to her fate. In the final scene, Boyer, Ladd and Miss Kerr, together with a little band of British diehards, attempt a last-ditch defense of the palace against the encroaching horde. It is a comment on the picture's improbability that the prime minister, who has adhered to the doctrine of non-violence all his life, finally takes up a machine-gun and starts shooting at his insurgent subjects with it.

Cast: Charles Boyer, Deborah Kerr, Alan Ladd, Corinne Calvet.—Paramount.

The job of dropping the fateful A-Bomb on Hiroshima was, indeed, "above and beyond" the call of duty. Beyond and before this fearful task lay another, equally shattering to the individuals involved—one of long and wearying preparation and planning, of stringent training and military security necessarily so tight as to seem almost totalitarian. It is with the history of this story-behind-the story and Col. Paul Tibbets, the man who commanded the top-secret A-Bomb unit, that Above And Beyond is primarily concerned. From the time he is recalled to the U.S. from the war in North Africa to embark on a mysterious mission, Col. Tibbets (Robert Taylor) finds that even his personal life is no longer his own. He can spend only a half-hour in the Washington airport with his wife (Eleanor Parker) before setting off again, for Wichita and the beginning of "Operation Silver-

Blemishes*: "Noxzema helped heal my minor blemishes* fast!" says Skye Patrick of New Orleans, La. "My skin looks so much softer and smoother."

all use Tampax of course

"Such a big difference!"

What a contrast between Tampax and the outside kind of sanitary protection you are accustomed to! Tampax is many times smaller and is worn internally and therefore needs no belts, pins or other supports to keep it in place. It's perfect!

"So ingenious" The doctor who invented Tampax certainly gave us an ingenious product. Pure surgical cotton gives reliable absorption and the Tampax comes in slender applicators for convenient insertion. You can't even feel the Tampax when in place. (And disposal is so easy.)

"Daintiness plus" There's no odor with Tampax because it's worn internally. And if you're a girl who is careful about her silhouette (about bulges and edge-lines "showing through" a close-fitting skirt or dress) you'd better investigate Tampax right away.

"Gives me confidence!"

Wearing Tampax gives me greater confidence than I've ever had, socially and at my job. I don't feel conspicuous on "those days." I know that "nobody knows" . . . plate." The enormity of his responsibility is heavy on Tibbets' shoulders, and he works day and night, a lonely man. Even when his wife at last is allowed to join him, he cannot tell her his troubles. This unhappy situation gradually develops into marital discord. Misunderstanding his stoic suffering for pomposity and ambition, his wife threatens to leave him. Finally Tibbets' security officer (James Whitmore), fearing the consequences of Mrs. Tibbets' growing hysteria, tells the colonel to force her to leave. This, the screenplay would have it, is the somber background from which Col. Tibbets went forward to pilot a B-29, the "Enola Gay," through the murky mist to Japan on that historical day now known as Hiroshima. Much of the colonel's personal tragedy—the frustration of his wife, his own nightmares—seem all too real. But the ring of the whole is wrong. Sometimes, more often than the picture shows, there must have been for the chosen colonel the thrill of a job well done, the tinkered-with plane that turned out right, the well-drilled crew that could be counted on. The exciting, over-all story of the important mission is neglected as the film focuses on the Tibbets' increasing marital discord. Thus Above and Beyond becomes a depressing domestic drama rather than the thrilling documentary it could have been about this incident in our country's history.

Cast: Robert Taylor, Eleanor Parker, James Whitmore.—MGM.

MY PAL GUS

The common, everyday story of parents and their children and their trouble in bringing one another up is practically never touched on in the movies, although so close to all moviegoers—in fact, to most of the human kind. Because it tackles these problems with considerable honesty and, initially at least, with shocking effect, My Pal Gus is an unusual film. Richard Widmark is the father—a least likely nomination for this kind of role, perhaps, but he plays it with all the restrained feeling at his command. George Winslow, that remarkable youngster with the basso voice, is his unhappy hellion of a kindergarten son. One of those self-made millionaires, Widmark is willing to pay plenty to have the neurotic kid, whose mother left the household when times and paychecks were bad, put on the right track. The progressive school of lovely Joanne Dru seems just the place, but the trouble is, neither the boy nor the principal will cooperate. He continues to raise hell, and she says his father's loving presence is necessary (her theory, not so modern after all, is that parents should have as much to do with child-rearing as the teachers). This brings a new parent-teacher association into rapid—though convincing being. Widmark, the blustering man of business, is subconsciously on the make for marital as well as parental happiness. This is when the screenplay goes astray. Suddenly, from nowhere except the dens where big-time operators have been keeping her, comes Audrey Totter, as the original wife and mother. Not malevolent but moneywise, she knows a good thing when she sees it and, when her former husband refuses to pay off, sends him into a scandalous court custody fight that almost ruins him and his hopes. None of this is overly melodramatic or unbelievable; actually, it paints a memorable portrait of that pristine American, the self-made man, with a whim of iron, the kind of man who fights to the end for the right, even if in yielding he could save something more important to him than face.

Cast: Richard Widmark, Joanne Dru, George Winslow, Audrey Totter.—20th Century-Fox.

BABES IN BAGDAD

The magic of the Arabian nights is nowhere evident in this tale of old Bagdad. Featuring as complicated a story as was ever plotted by a team of tired scriptwriters, the film is more often off-color than colorful. In the maze of plots and counterplots, it is, however, possible to find one novel idea: In ancient times the son (Richard Ney) of a Persian caliph fought for equal rights for women. His eye caught by fiery Paulette Goddard, latest houri to be added to the harem of Bagdad's Kadi (John Boles), Ney plots with the Kadi's oldtime favorite, a fiery type too, named Gypsy Rose Lee, who wants to hold her man. Ney, on the other hand, wants to free the new girl from her forthcoming marriage vows so she can marry him. The plans that Ney and his two girl friends evolve include the tortuous tunneling of a secret passageway between his villa and the Kadi's palace by a band of blind men. But that's nothing to what follows—fights, festivities, magic potions and even a water ballet. All this seems so to confuse the old caliph that he readily admits his son is right: Women can prove the equal of men, so Paulette can have his son, the man of her choice. Practiced showgirls both, the Misses Goddard and Lee play their parts with all the dignity of the stars of an old-time burlesque revue. And in this show, that is as it should be.

Cast: Paulette Goddard, Gypsy Rose Lee, Richard Ney, John Boles.—United Artists.

SPECIAL AT-HOME TREATMENT FOR 4 PROBLEMS OF "YOUNG SKIN"!

Now—you don't have to let nature rob you of a nice skin. And it's so true. When a girl needs a pretty complexion, nature seems bent on spoiling it. Skin that only yesterday was baby-soft, suddenly begins to develop over-active oil glands. And at the same time your skin seems to get sluggish about throwing off the every-day accumulation of dead-skin cells. When these tiny, dead flakes build up into a layer over the pore openings—there's trouble ahead. Enlarged pores and even blackheads are on the way.

Today Pond's recommends a greaseless treatment for these four major problems: oiliness, sluggishness, enlarged pores, blackheads. It's quick, easy!

Cover face, all except eyes, with a lavish 1-Minute Mask of Pond's Vanishing Cream. Leave 1 minute. The Cream's "keratolytic" action loosens stubborn, dead-skin cells—dissolves them off! Frees the tiny skin gland openings so they can function normally. Now—after 60 seconds—tissue off. How tingling-fresh your skin feels. And how much smoother, clearer it looks.

SPECIAL TO MODERN SCREEN:

hollywood report

by Mike Connolly

famous columnist for
The Hollywood Reporter

WHO'S MAD AT WHOM:

It took the annual MODERN SCREEN party—a big, beautiful, bustling blowout that proved to be the year's best brawl—to bring a lot of things out into the open. For instance—Arlene Dahl and Fernando Lamas showed up on one of their first dates . . . But Lana Turner, who had just broken up with Fernando and hadn't yet gotten around to dating Arlene's ex, Lex Barker, got the 'flu and couldn't make the party . . . Dale Robertson was there with his Jackie at the very time their break-up was still Page One news. "Reckon Jackie and I had just a minor misunderstanding," said Dale. "What's all the frettin' and stewin' about?" . . . Marilyn Monroe catted, "I've loved seeing Ginger Rogers in movies ever since I was a little girl!" . . . Johnnie Ray crashed the party, which was held in the Beverly Hills Hotel, and turned out to be a regular little old celebrity seeker. Johnnie was all over the place gawking at Arlene, Dale, Marilyn, Janie Powell, Aldo Ray, Ava Gardner—you name 'em and Mine Host, Mr. George Delacorte, had 'em at his swellegant shindig!

Turner

Brando

It was shortly after this party that Ava, Lana and Lana's business manager, Ben Cole, who were visiting the Sinatra home in Palm Springs, got tossed out on their ears by Frankie. Apparently he's as jealous of the way Ava spends her time away from him as she is of him . . . And, when you stop to think that Ava's marriages have lasted an average of a year apiece, mebbe Frank has reasons! . . . The MGM publicity boys were the happiest in town when Marlon Brando checked off the lot after finishing Julius Caesar. He refused to talk to press. But who knows—maybe the day will come when the lads who write for a living won't be asking questions about Marlon!

TIME TABLES:

Bouncing Patricia Anne was welcomed five weeks prematurely by Ronnie and Nancy Reagan . . . Angela Lansbury and Peter Shaw expect their baby about May 1, although Pete couldn't be sure about the exact date when I called to check. Said he, "It'll probably arrive the first rainy night that the car won't start!" . . . Jeff Hunter couldn't get back to his ever-lovin' Barbara Rush and the hearthside in time for Christmas because Sailor Of The King ran into all sorts of production delays abroad. Poor Jeff hadn't seen his child since it was a week old!

The Reagans

Hunter

Barbara Stanwyck and Ralph Meeker broke up, whereupon she started seeing young Bobby Wagner, of all people, and Ralph resumed with an old flame, Nina Foch . . . They're calling Tab Hunter, who'll pose for a beefcake picture at the pop of a flash-bulb, "the male Marilyn Monroe" . . . As a matter of fact, Tab, who was trying to ease in on Joe DiMaggio's territory and date Marilyn, finally did meet her, and this is what he said: "Believe me when I say this, you're the only girl I know who can wear Levis!" And Marilyn just smiled enigmatically . . . Clark Gable has been doing Italy with an old friend of his, the Countess Dorothy DiFrasso . . . Geary Steffen ordered a pair of baby skis for the new Powell-Steffen image a month before the child arrived. Geary believes in starting 'em young.

LONG HUNCH DEPT':

Celeste Holm phoned, very upset, to say that gossip columnists who have linked her romantically with Dr. Peter Lindstrom, who is, as you all know, Bergman's ex-husband, are doing it maliciously. Celeste says it's a plot to ruin the doctor's reputation and thus get daughter Pia away from him and back to Ingrid, but I've got a strong notion it won't work . . . Funny, isn't it, how Ethel Barrymore has managed to stay at the top of her profession all these years without sensational publicity. But the younger Barrymores can't seem to become top stars even with it!

Mitzi Gaynor

. . . Dick Coyle, his romance with Mitzi Gaynor broken up, has started dating a new gal—a brunette whose name I didn't get—and she's much nearer Dick's own age than Mitzi . . . Wait'll you see Jennifer Jones in Ruby Gentry, sliding through the mud. It's the most realistic kind of acting we've seen since Bette Davis used to make herself look so ugly.

Humphrey Bogart made a bet of $50 with his agent, Irving Lazar, that Judy Garland's baby would be a boy . . . You won't be finding two happier people than the newly-wed Joan Fontaine and Collier Young—even though sister Olivia deHavilland didn't attend the wedding!—once Joan realizes her dream of regaining custody of daughter Deborah. Both Collie and Joan love children, as witness the fact that Collie was Godfather for the Ida Lupino-Howard Duff baby, Bridget, and bought the infant's christening gown himself in Paris . . . Walter deHavilland, the 85-year-old father of Olivia and Joan, was visiting Olivia in Hollywood on his first visit here at the very moment Joan and Collie were getting married. Pop wasn't invited to the wedding either . . . Just as Liz Taylor was expecting her baby, spouse Mike Wilding got knocked off the payroll at MGM for turning down the role of a heel in Latin Lovers, the Turner-Montalban starrer. Can't say I blame him—but baby does need shoes!

HOLLYWOOD HEARTBEATS:

Death always seems to strike in three's in Hollywood—as witness the passing of Dixie Crosby, Hattie McDaniel and Pamela Lang, all within a few days of each other . . . Saddest, to me, was Dixie's death, because I think she knew it was coming many, many months before. Remember when she threw that birthday party for Bing last spring and invited none but their oldest, closest friends? It was as though she wanted one last look at the old gang together . . . The four Crosby boys sat inside the pew at the funeral Mass in Beverly Hills, while Bing sat in the aisle seat, looking wan and thin and tired, praying with his head bowed and hands folded under his chin alongside the white-gardenia-and-orchid-blanketed casket. Mostly he knelt motionless, his face drawn with grief, except that now and then his index finger came up out of the church-and-steeple formed by his folded hands and scratched the side of his nose or brushed away a tear . . . The fans behaved surprisingly well outside the church at the funeral but some of the newspaper photographers got over-excited. They kept poking their cameras into Bing's limousine, and, at the cemetery, Bing refused to alight from his car until one photog, who was bound he would

Dixie Crosby

ODDS BODKINS:

In Hollywood, where movie stars are a dime a dozen, it wasn't surprising that nobody lined up along the line of march for the Junior Chamber of Commerce parade in which Ann Blyth sat atop the back seat of the first open car in the parade. The citizens of Hollywood are just too blasé—and, watching the parade, I couldn't help but think how the fans back East would have rushed at this opportunity to catch a closeup of one of their favorite stars... Did you know that June Haver still wears her wedding ring, after all these years of separation?... And that Errol Flynn still receives more fan mail than any other star at Warners—more than Gordon MacRae, Gene Nelson, Steve Cochran or any of the other newcomers? You fans are REALLY loyal!... Lunching with Shelley Winters at Romanoff's, I learned that her Vittorio was insisting that their baby be born in Rome and not Hollywood. But Shelley was holding out for Hollywood!... Afterwards, out in front of Romanoff's, we ran into Cary Grant and Betsy Drake, and I introduced Shelley to them. Said she, "Gosh, after all these years I finally get to meet Cary Grant, and I'm pregnant!"... And Cary gave me this definition of a leading man: "An actor lucky enough to keep his hair and teeth."

Blyth

FUNNIES:

Ginger Rogers and Jacques Bergerac went to the Mocambo, and sitting nearby we listened to them talking about everything except what the columnists say they talk about: politics, the weather, economic conditions in France and Germany, acting, and life in general!... And, if this ISN'T love, the handsome Bergerac rates an Oscar for giving a great performance of a man hopelessly in love!... Jane Russell is acting as agent and publicity gal for brothers Wally and Jamie. But, as an observer points out, while the brothers have the socko Russell personality, charm and good looks, they just CAN'T come up to Jane's measurements!

QUICK QUOTES:

Mike Romanoff's secret of success: "My profound mistrust of human beings has stood me in good stead throughout the years"... Once upon a time a Beverly Hills hostess bragged to another BH hostess: "Prince Aly Khan is coming to stay at my house!" Snapped the second: "I wouldn't dream of having a Mohammedan in my house!"... Somebody asked Tallulah Bankhead if she thought separate heds were conducive to a happy marriage. "Separate beds?" boomed Bankhead. "You mean separate towns!"... A guy named Stanley Balokowski called me and giggled that he'd like to marry Phyllis Kirk but—"I don't want to give her a bad name!"... Barbara Peyton, who never seems to be able to stay out of Page One scandals, tells us: "I'd rather live in Hollywood than any place else in the world but I'm treated badly here. In London and on the Continent they treat me like a lady. And I am a lady!"... Sign on the bulletin board of a church in Hollywood: "If you have troubles, come in and tell us about them. If not, come in and tell us how you do it."

SEX APPEAL:

Fans who attended the Steak For Connie preview in Westwood were wondering just how tight Janet Leigh could wear her clothes and not faint dead away through lack of oxygen... There are those who claim that Marilyn Monroe's success has put the nose of her fellow 20th contractee, Betty Grable, out of joint—especially after Marilyn got the starring role in Gentlemen Prefer Blondes and Betty lost it. But it's not true. Betty Grable doesn't have a jealous bone in her body... Joan Crawford packed 50 dresses and 36 pairs of shoes into her trunk for a weekend visit in Dallas and Fort Worth, but stayed for weeks and weeks and weeks! It's love, kids!

Leigh

My eyehalls were popping out of their sockets over the lowest-cut dress I've ever seen Marie Wilson wearing—till she came over to my table at LaRue and explained, "I sent this dress to the cleaners and when it came back I couldn't get into it"... Mike O'Shea gave Virginia Mayo a black lace nightgown with "I Love You" embroidered thereon. No special occasion. He says he just loves the gal.

FINANCIAL PAGE:

Before she married George Sanders, Zsa Zsa Gabor summed up a certain suitor this way: "But how could I be bored by him, dolling, when he's worth $2,000,000?"... Zsa Zsa, by the way, went up to James Mason in the MGM commissary and pouted, "Your wife spends most of her time spreading vicious stories about people and I wish she would stop." And James snapped back, "She just repeats what you tell her!"... Peggy Dow's baby will get a $1,000,000 trust fund from its fond daddy, Walt Helmerich... This is John Wayne's deal for making a picture at Warners: The studio hands him $750,000 to make the complete picture, including salary for himself, the rest of the cast and crew, etc. Then after you fans have forked over a total of $750,000 to pay for the actual cost of the picture at the boxoffice, Warners and Wayne split the rest of the money taken in 50/50. Quite a deal for a star, but John's just the biggest in the business so they figure he's worth it... Irene Dunne isn't doing badly either. She got $48,000 for three weeks' work in television's Schlitz Playhouse.

Monty Clift's brother is working as a floor manager for NBC . . . Louis B. Mayer tossed a dinner party to celebrate being named chairman of the board of the new Cine-rama company, and Janie Wyman sang and sang and sang for hours for the guests and her new bandleader husband, Freddie Karger. But not for Louis B., who was having trouble with his teeth and couldn't come downstairs to join the fun . . . The daily papers said that this is Jane's second wedding. Isn't it her fourth? . . .

SKIRMISHES OF THE MONTH:

Abigail Adams and Georgie Jessel had their umpteenth fight in the eight years they've been dating. After neighbors called the police, Abigail told me, "Georgie and I won't split up. We couldn't find anyone else who could put up with either of us, so we HAVE to stick together!" . . . But while Abigail was telling me this, Georgie was catching the first plane for New York! . . . Gene Tierney threatened to smash the camera of a Paris photographer who snapped her with Aly Khan . . . And, in Salome, Rita Hayworth never does get to lose that seventh veil. At the critical moment there's an interruption—the head of John the Baptist arrives on a plate!

Hayworth

Nobody thought Bette Davis would ever get her stage musical, Two's Company, on Broadway. While they were trying it out on the road every fight she had with other cast members was reported in the New York papers as though the brawls were happening right there on Broadway . . . Maria Riva, Marlene Dietrich's daughter, turned down a chance to make a picture—"because the role in that picture is a cheap imitation of my mother" . . . Wanna know the REAL reason Mario Lanza didn't want to make The Student Prince? It required him to do some real acting, for a change—starting as a silly play-boy prince and developing into a noble king—and Mario didn't think he was ready for it. He was just plain SCARED!

SEND UP THE ROCKETS . . . RING THE BELLS. THERE'S A NEW BABY AT JANIE POWELL'S HOUSE. ● BY PAMELA MORGAN girl!*

■ The shout went ringing down the hospital corridor—bounced back as an echo from countless doorways. A woman awakened, looked at her clock with the luminous dial. It was just 20 minutes past one o'clock in the morning. She smiled. Moonlight filtered into the hospital room. It seemed so cozy and warm in her neat white bed. She yawned sleepily. Oh yes, what was that noise that had disturbed her? Now she remembered. The same thing had happened the night before. Her husband had also been excited when he had been told he was a father. That was it. The noise she had heard was a man's voice, proclaiming the arrival of another baby. She yawned once more. She was completely relaxed and happy. It was quiet once again. She fell asleep immediately.

The exultant voice belonged to a proud man—a new father. It was the voice of Geary Steffen, whose wife, Jane Powell, had just given birth to a baby girl.

Geary put his hand over his mouth after realizing that it was the wee hours of the morning and that he was in a hospital. Then he laughed at himself and started walking more sedately down the corridor to the happy people waiting for him. Thoughts tumbled through his mind. What a day this had been! He stopped. "Let me taste every moment, just as it happened."

It began quite early the day before—Thursday, November 20, 1952.

FROM THE MOVIES

APRIL IN PARIS—Title song by Doris Day* (Columbia); Johnny Desmond (MGM). Give Me Your Lips by Alan Dean (MGM).

EVERYTHING I HAVE IS YOURS—title song by Bob Eberly (Capitol).

IVANHOE and PLYMOUTH ADVENTURE—album from sound tracks* (MGM).

This unusual LP brings you several selections from each picture, with Miklos Roszo conducting the MGM studio orchestra and chorus in his own compositions. The music takes in a variety of moods, with the love themes (such as Rebecca's Love from Ivanhoe) generally most impressive.

LILI—Hi-Lili, Hi-Lo by Dinah Shore* (Victor).

PETER PAN—First Star To Your Right and Your Mother And Mine by Doris Day (Columbia).

SOMEBODY LOVES ME—album by Betty Hutton (Victor).

Betty (alias Blossom Seeley) does one of her better jobs on this collection of songs immortalized by voudevillians of the 1920s. Even the titles have a nostalgic sound—like That Teasin' Rag and Toddling The Todalo.

STARS AND STRIPES FOREVER—album from sound track (MGM).

The John Philip Sousa brand of music was, of course, appropriate for the biographical movie based on the life of this famed march composer. Taken away from the exciting visual settings of the picture it loses something of its charm unless you're a rabid march fan, and I don't mean Fredric. The title song, and Semper Fidelis, Turkey In The Straw, El Capitan et al. are played here by the 20th Century-Fox studio orchestra and choir, ably conducted by Alfred Newman.

POPULAR

HARRY BELAFONTE—*Shenandoah (Victor).

The young balladeer who found fame, fortune and Hollywood beckoning him when he turned to folk-singing does excellently with this number and the coupling, Scarlet Ribbons. You'll be seeing his first movie, See How They Run, very soon.

ROSEMARY CLOONEY—*If I Had A Penny (Columbia).

PERRY COMO—*Don't Let The Stars Get In Your Eyes (Victor).

JAZZ

BUDDY DE FRANCO—King of The Clarinet album* (MGM).

BENNY GOODMAN—*1937-38 Jazz Concert No. 2 (Columbia).

The two greatest clarinetists of jazz in two sets of exciting performances: Buddy's recorded recently in a studio; Benny's broadcast in the 1930s and recently made into an album from recordings of his radio shows.

Spanish count Jose Villa-Padierna (right) made Rita feel at home when she, Aly (left) and rider Cavanillas visited him in happier days.

There's been a lot of printed and unprintable gossip about Rita and Aly. But here's the absolutely last word—by someone who should know.

Cinderella's tired

by Sheila Graham

■ It's over. Finished. Kaput. It's the End. Rita Hayworth, the Beautiful Movie Star and Aly Khan, the handsome trillionaire Moslem Prince. No more weeping. No more wooing. Just cold dollars and cents to seal for all time the Great Romance. Because it is over. Even Rita, the ever hopeful, knows it now. Aly knew it before she went over that last time for the Big Reconciliation that turned into the Big Flop. And right here and now I'm putting the blame—not on Mame—but fairly and squarely on Aly. Because if it takes two to make a quarrel, it certainly takes two to make up. And Aly was asleep at the switch when he should have been awake at the controls. Whether it was deliberate or not makes no difference now. And unless there is an unforeseeable last-second change of mind, Rita will complete the long-pending divorce in Nevada just as soon as Miss Sadie Thompson is in the can at Columbia.

Of course, they never should have tied the knot in the first place. (Continued on page 65)

things, they said about Fernando's love for Lana.
Is his new romance with Arlene so hot it's got to cool down, also?

BY IMOGENE COLLINS

— it's

LOVE! LOVE! LOVE!

Fernando wanted Lana badly. He divorced his wife for her, made no secret of his great amour. But now they're not even on speaking terms.

Arlene Dahl's the girl for him, at present. Since the Davies party they're seldom seen apart. But how long will this romance last, everyone's asking.

■ There are some actors in Hollywood whose love-lives resemble nothing so much as a high-staked relay race.

For the most part, these are emotionally immature men who date a different girl each night, preferably a big-name actress, and then revel in the luxury of reading about themselves in the gossip columns next morning.

Occasionally, however, an actor comes along who refuses to use women, who dedicates himself to one female at a time with such intensity, such passion, such fidelity and concentration that he is recognized at once as The Great Lover; in fact, the greatest lover Hollywood has known in two decades: Fernando Lamas.

At 37, tapering and tall, wavy-haired and sensuous-looking, Fernando is completely, tempestuously, envelopingly in love with Arlene Dahl, a fragile, willowy stalk of auburn-tressed loveliness who is tinder that will touch any red-blooded male to flame.

Not that Senor Lamas has bought any commercial spot announcements on radio or TV to advertise his new love. In true Latin tradition, he is a lover who retains his ardor for the privacy of the boudoir. But he tips his heart so easily. His feelings are so evident in his single-minded devotion to Arlene.

Since the 15th of October last he has dated no other woman but Dahl. He dines with her each night after work. You can see them in such picturesque restaurants as Frascati's or the Villanova, in the two Hollywood night clubs, Ciro's (Continued on page 64)

Bing, his head bowed with grief, leaves the Church of the Good Shepherd after the Requiem Mass for Dixie. His arm is around his youngest son, Lindsay. Philip is at the right, while Gary and Dennis (not pictured) walk behind.

This is the Palm Springs house that Dixie Lee Crosby yearned for, planned, decorated, and furnished, but never lived to see. Bing, knowing Dixie was doomed to die shortly, went ahead with plans for the house nevertheless, knowing it would make her happy.

Bing Crosby's Future

Death forced on Bing the tragic acceptance of life without Dixie. An intimate friend tells how he is learning to face the future.

■ Let's get this question out of the way—right away:

There Will Be No Second Marriage for Bing Crosby.

I am no fortuneteller, but I feel I can say from knowledge based on a long friendship and what I believe is a real understanding of one of the best-known least-known men in the world, that he can never accept or even look for a substitute for the great love Dixie bore him.

It wouldn't be good enough.

Yes, I know that whether he wishes it or not he has fallen heir to the title of the world's most eligible marriageable man since the Duke of Windsor was a bachelor. And he will be pursued and lured and tempted by the most beautiful and talented women, and just hopeful ones, too, wherever he goes.

I still say that it all will be futile and that Bing will retire into a man's world of his four rapidly growing sons and his intimate, closed circle of men friends who have been for years his inseparable companions. One of these is his writer Bill Morrow. Another is his songwriter, Jimmy Van Heusen.

Bing is a man's man—no matter how many women swoon over his love songs—and already there are strong indications that he will slip more and more deeply into the quiet, easy, retiring solace of male companionship particularly involving the raising of his sons.

Now that Dixie is gone, many things can be told which could not be revealed while she still clung to life—never knowing that she was the victim of incurable cancer.

As a strong indication as to where the future points, let us go back to the immediate past, to just a few hours following an operation performed on Dixie last summer.

The scene is St. John's Hospital and two men are standing apart from the others talking. One is Dr. Arnold Stevens, the fine Los Angeles surgeon. The other is Bing.

Stevens' arm is around Bing's shoulder. He has just told him that Dixie is hopelessly the victim of cancer; that even he and his consultants (Continued on page 85)

Jane had known Columbia's Fred Karger casually for years, but fell in love after working for three happy months under his smooth musical supervision.

A surprised crew had a wedding cake ready when Jane and Fred reported to work after their weekend wedding. Music is their great love in common.

For a long time, Jane Wyman's been warbling and Fred Karger's been a music man. But Hollywood never suspected

He ran away with her heart

■ A great many movie stars, when planning to be married, have bent over backward to keep the wedding plans a secret. This is understandable, in view of the fact that their average days have the privacy of life in a zoo cage, and they strive to keep anything so personal as a wedding free of the press, curiosity seekers, and flashbulbs. Few of them have made the grade so effectively as Jane Wyman in her recent marriage to musician Fred Karger.

So tightly was the secret kept that four days before the marriage ceremony studio publicists, unaware of the romance, fluffed an opportunity for a picture of Miss Wyman and Mr. Karger together. Fred Karger, in his position as musical supervisor at Columbia Studios, rehearses those stars who have musical routines in their pictures, and in preparation for Great While It Lasted, had been working for weeks with Miss Wyman. The publicists decided to take a picture of Jane standing by the piano, and asked Mr. Karger to turn his face away from the camera so that they would not have to go through the complication of identifying him and his work in the picture's caption. Instead of feeling miffed about the incident, both Jane and Fred were highly amused, because it was proof positive that no one suspected their plans.

The romance had begun only a few weeks before, when Jane reported at Columbia for Great While It Lasted. It turned out, from the beginning, to be a real love song for Jane. Five years had gone by since her final divorce decree from Ronald Reagan, and during that time her name was continually coupled with assorted men. Columnists reported that she was in love again, with one man after another, but Jane herself denied romantic interest with any of them. Her career had shot to new heights, and while she was not averse to the idea of marrying again, there was not only no time for romance, but more important, there was no one to capture her heart . . . no one until the day she reported for rehearsal and began working with, and getting to know, Fred Karger.

Dusty Rogers was getting a little worried about things. Here it was his sixth birthday at last, but the day of days was slipping fast away and Daddy and Mommy still weren't home. For understandable reasons and certain unforgotten promises, Dusty gazed anxiously at the setting sun in one direction and more anxiously at the purple mountains in the other, as he pressed his nose into a shapeless bump against the airport gate. Back of him his big sisters, Cheryl and Linda, stood on one foot and then the other.

But at last the sky speck appeared and grew and the loud speaker blared, "Flight Number 14 arriving from Dallas." Dusty clamped his fingers on the wire and tugged excitedly as the plane swooped down like a big, silver stork, taxied and rolled to a stop. He was shouting "Hey, Dad—Hey!" long before the steps were fastened and the belly door swung open. Sure enough, there was the familiar cream colored stetson and the round, grinning face he was waiting for. Roy Rogers waved to his waiting brood and (Continued on page 58)

WHAT LANA DOES TO MEN

■ The year was 1947. A newspaper headline read: "Ty Gives Up Lana For Fight On Reds." A wag commented: "That's logical enough. How could one expect a guy to have enough energy to fight Communism all day and pay court to Lana Turner every night?" The fellow in question was, of course, Tyrone Power. Just a little over three months before, he and Lana had parted lovers. They had tossed a tender farewell dinner at which the goblets bore the etchings of their names entwined with hearts and flowers. With dry-eyed grief, Lana had gone to the airport to see her current lover fly off into the wild blue yonder on another "goodwill tour" of Africa and Europe.

There were plans to meet in Casablanca; but they never came off. Ty cabled briefly that the rendezvous was impractical. He failed to explain that he had met a bewitching woman in Rome named Linda Christian. When he returned here, he expressed his alarm over the rising tides of Communism abroad and admitted that his romance with Lana was over. Hence the misleading headline. The two subjects had nothing to do with each other. Frankly I was among the befooled. I had known Ty since his youth, and his father before him. He (Continued on page 81)

MAKE

HONEST

BY JIM HENAGHAN

■ Dear Jane:

You got me in a peck of trouble. You and that smile and that laugh. The trouble with you is that you put your feet up on a chair and whenever anybody asks you a straight-forward question, you laugh and give them a straight-forward answer. Movie stars are not supposed to do this.

I was sitting up in the MODERN SCREEN Hollywood office and the editor was pacing up and down chewing his finger nails and dripping executive ability all over the rug. Every once in a while he would stop and look at me with what I suspect was an expression of loathing.

"You've got to get on the ball, Henaghan," he kept saying. "Younger men are getting into this business, you know, and none of us (meaning me, of course) are too secure these days."

"I do my level best, sir," I said. "I try very hard."

"Sometimes that's not enough, old man" (meaning me), he said. "Sometimes we have to extend ourselves. Get the old noodle to grinding."

"I've got the old noodle grinding this very minute," I said. "I'm right on the old ball this morning."

"And what have we come up with that will please our readers?" he said.

Well, to tell you the truth, Miss Russell, the old noodle was grinding all right, but it wasn't coming up with anything, if you please. Then I (Continued on page 94)

■ He's tall and he's moody and he moves like a leopard—and you really can't understand Burt Lancaster fully, unless you know four very special things about him.

The names of those four extra special things are Jimmy and Billy and Susan Elizabeth and Joanna Lancaster, all blond, all beautiful. Jimmy's just six-and-a-half. Joanna won't be two until next July. Billy and Susabet are neatly spaced in between. Up until now Burt has always refused to talk about them, or let them be photographed for publication. His general attitude has been that his domestic life was one thing, his career another. He never has intended to let anything upset either.

Along about the time that Burt clicked big in his first picture, The Killers, a certain glamor girl found this out subtly, as you find out all things about him. You might not expect that a big, strong guy who has been a professional athlete and circus acrobat would be subtle, but Burt is.

Nobody knew him when Miss Glamorpuss took out after him. He'd come to Hollywood, an ex-G.I. with one Broadway flop behind him, and no dough. But even then he had those broad shoulders, slim hips, penetrating eyes and the habit he still has, of talking like crazy about everything under (Continued on page 87)

HERE'S THE PARTY THAT LASTS ALL YEAR—MODERN SCREEN'S TRIBUTE TO HOLLYWOOD'S TOP STARS

■ "Having a baby doesn't guarantee a girl that she'll win MODERN SCREEN's annual popularity award, but it certainly helps!"

The author of that statement is Jane Powell, the Hollywood Glamor Mother of the Year. Janie, who arrived at our elegant shindig at the Beverly Hills Hotel in an off-the-shoulder white taffeta maternity evening gown with jeweled unattached collar, had this to add: "Any resemblance between my statement and the truth is strictly not coincidental, because it was just a year ago that I watched June Allyson accept her award. Filled to the brim with envy, I asked, 'How did you manage it?' And Junie, who was expecting at the time, retorted, 'Just become an expectant mother and your popularity will go zooming.'

"Well, I laughed at the time, but that's exactly what happened! And it goes without saying that winning MODERN SCREEN's beautiful cup is the high point of my career!"

Janie's "bubbling over" established the exciting keynote for the annual awards party. Her enthusiasm seemed to light up the entire Rodeo Room to provide a fitting entrance for Mr. John Wayne, her co-winner as the most popular male star for the second straight year. It is no secret that John Wayne seldom goes to parties. Matter of fact, he shied like a wild colt when the editors told him he'd won the silver cup.

"Golly," he exclaimed, "does that mean that I have to go and have speeches made at me?"

Assured that this was not the case; that anyone making a big fat speech at a MODERN SCREEN party is certain to get the old heave-ho, "The Duke" arrived early and stayed late, towering over the other males at the party and having the time of his life.

When Publisher George T. Delacorte presented him with his award over a nationwide radio broadcast, John spent two-and-a-half minutes giving credit (Continued on page 67)

Betty was worried before opening at the Palladium. But her mother was there to make light of her fears and cheer her on as usual.

Singing, dancing, and a heart-stopping finale on the trapeze were exhausting. Betty, only briefly recovered from surgery, collapsed once.

Dear Mr. Saxon:

I first met Betty Hutton back in her dressing room at the London Palladium. She was wringing wet, clutching one of the many bouquets that surrounded her, and sobbing with joy and relief. She looked like a newly-crowned Olympic swimming champion, even to the traditional terry-cloth bathrobe and damp curly locks clinging to her shiny forehead.

Calming down a little and breathing more or less evenly after the "walking out" Charlie O'Curran had just given her, she submitted to a rub down as her husband muttered, "Mustn't let my filly catch cold." To complete the sportslike atmosphere in the greasepaint scented room, he draped a towel over her head, boxer fashion.

"This sure is a better way to recuperate fast," said Betty, "than floppin' down on the floor like some dancer as soon as the curtain's down. This way you get your wind back naturally. Right, Porkchop?"

"I said so, didn't I?"

"Then that's enough for me!" and Hutton popped up to hug O'Curran.

"Save your energy. You're on again in an hour and a half," her man said as he disentangled himself.

Catching herself in a mistake, Betty turns to husband Charles O'Curran for help, comfort, correction and advice. Ever since their marriage in the spring of 1952, he has been her coach and manager.

June, Dick Powell, Pam and Ricky at home.

June Allyson goes Country

June and Dick are a couple of hicks who live in the sticks and love it! The Powell family's rambling fieldstone farmhouse is something they've been yearning for a long time.

■ In the Powell household this was one of those rare, incredible, delightful days.

June Allyson had a day off before she was scheduled to start Remains To Be Seen, her eighth picture with Van Johnson. Dick Powell had just finished what he considers his best acting role in films, the portrayal of the writer in The Bad And The Beautiful. The children were nowhere about, and the afternoon stretched before June and Dick like some glorious private holiday.

After lunch they strolled around their Bel-Air gardens. First they examined the peach trees June had planted three years ago. Then they got down on all fours to measure the bulb sprouts. From time to time they talked busily about nothing in particular.

Presently, Dick said, "Where are the kids, darling?" He never can keep quite up to date on Ricky and Pam's schedule. (Continued on page 52)

Ever since Dick Powell came to Hollywood, he's had his eye on this fieldstone house. He promised himself long ago he'd own it one day; finally bought it from singer John Charles Thomas for about $170,000.

The three oak tables and the breakfront fit perfectly into the new dining room. June didn't buy one new piece of furniture. The rugs and the English chintz from their other home were perfect, too.

A room within a room is this fireplace alcove. Its low-beamed ceiling is scoled for family enjoyment. The half-way point in a tremendous 40-foot living room, when just the Powells gather on the hearth, it's a cozy, intimate place.

The roomy farm kitchen is the sort that lingers in your memory as the Grandmother's. Its brick oven, pine cabinets, and beamed ceiling will provide many happy memories for the Powell children.

Modern and traditional mix happily in the new house as modern plate glass frames on old Colonial door.

The original owners installed a $40,000 theater-sized projection booth behind this living room wall.

Guests roll up to the back door of the Mandeville Canyon house to see June and Dick. "Yoo-hoo. Anybody home?"

"Hi, there. Grand to see you. Come on out back. Got my chores to do, but I can always use a hand," grins cordial Farmerette Allyson

"Look at me! No cops, no traffic . . . no license." But she's really only holding the wheel till Richard the tractor-man comes.

"Maybe you pull it instead." Cute as a button making a molehill out of a mountain, she'll never replace the old fashioned bulldozer.

"First you mow it down (above); then you rake it up (below). This farm work just never stops . . . but, gee, it's fun."

"Eggs-actly the way I've always wanted it," sighs happy Mrs. Powell, who has a home, a farm, a private lake, and a world full of love.

"Taking a nap," Junie answered. "Richard, don't you think this poodle cut of mine is simply awful? I didn't want to do it, you know. The studio made me, for this picture. Really, I . . ."

"Stop worrying about your old poodle cut," Dick joshed. "Why don't we ride around a little and look at houses?"

"I'd love to," Junie said. At this point house-hunting had become a fascinating new interest with her. She and Dick had both decided that they would build a house altogether different than the Tudor mansion they were currently occupying.

They piled into June's powder-blue Hillman Minx, Dick's last birthday present to her, and with the top down, leisurely drove out along Sunset Boulevard. At the juncture of Sunset and Mandeville Canyon, Dick turned right, up past the homes of Esther Williams, Don DeFore, Richard Widmark, Diana Lynn and many of the other film celebrities who prefer the quiet rural life.

Junie tossed her head back and breathed a whiff of canyon air. "Gosh! It smells good, Richard."

Richard grinned and continued driving, humming the first eight bars of a tune called, "Wish You Were Here." They drove for several miles beyond the last house in the canyon before June spoke up. "We might as well turn around at the next wide place in the road," she said. "I don't think there's anything beyond this."

"Let's see where this lane leads," Dick suggested, turning off onto a side road. Deftly he maneuvered the little car between a couple of fence posts and up a steep, winding incline to the hills above the canyon.

Junie was impressed. "Gosh!" she muttered. "What a view, Richard! A lake, too!"

She came a LONG way!

■ One cheerless, smog-stricken morning about a year-and-a-half ago, a giant silver bird (that's what travelogue narrators call an air-liner) settled down a runway at the Los Angeles International Airport and lumbered over to an awkward stop before one of the unloading enclosures. The motors whimpered to a stop, steps were pushed to the side of the plane, the doors were opened and the passengers, quickly emptied from the ship, were swallowed up by the usual crowd that welcomes all public carriers.

Several moments later a lone girl appeared in the doorway of the plane and stepped gingerly on to the platform at the top of the steps. Her eyelids were heavy with recent sleep. Her suit, natty in cut, was wrinkled and her hat seemed to be fiddling with the idea of falling off. She wrinkled her nose and smelled of the fume-laden air and her brow furrowed into an expression that seemed to cry: "How did we wind up in Pittsburgh?" She squinted her eyes and surveyed the charging trucks and luggage dollies scuttling about below her, and she swung about from right to left checking the buildings and flat, barren fields that flanked the runways.

REAL GONE AND STRAIGHT UP!

■ There were three of us at lunch in the 20th Century-Fox commissary, a barn of a place featuring murals having to do with the motion picture industry. The other two were a publicist named Julian and Robert Wagner, Fox's 22-year-old wunderkind. Wagner, who had spent the morning vaulting into a lifeboat from the deck of a reasonable facsimile of the ill-fated Titanic, was late and making efforts to catch up on the scoffing. In the Wagner vocabulary, somewhat inflected with bop, scoffing is eating.

"Look," he said to the waitress, "may I see the executives' menu?"

She handed him a small slip with four entrees listed on it; no more, but each a trifle fancier than what was being offered the proletariat. He settled for corned beef and cabbage.

"Some days," he said, "that menu's real gone. They got real crazy items on it. Shrimp newburg. Lord, I hate shrimp newburg."

"Bob," said Julian, "you know what this is about?"

"What what's about?"

"This story."

"No. What's it about?"

"Your romances. The girls you date. Are you in a hurry to get married? Stuff like that." Julian tossed it off as if I weren't holding my breath.

is for DADDY

■ High above the hills of Beverly, much higher than any other hill in the area, there stands a house that is in the process of being made into a home. It is not a very large house, although it rambles about a bit and therefore takes up most of the space on the small mesa on which it stands. In the main living quarters there is a combination living and dining room, sort of L-shaped, that at this time is furnished only with a dining table and a curving sofa beside a flagstone fireplace. Beyond this is a kitchen with gleaming white new equipment.

Through a door in an ash-panelled wall that runs the length of the house there are two bedrooms and two baths. One of the bedrooms is occupied by the owners, Mr. and Mrs. Michael Wilding, and it is furnished with a huge, low bed, a pair of dressers and a television set. The other room is empty, except for a large, canopied baby's bed. The walls of this room are bright yellow and the floor is as yet uncarpeted. This room is unoccupied at the moment, but it is about this chamber that the rest of the house is being planned, for it is here that the first child of Michael and Elizabeth Wilding will spend his or her first years.

At the time of this writing, the preparations for the coming of the infant are lumbering along. From early in the morning until the sun sinks into the sea beyond the last distant mountain, Michael and Elizabeth putter about the place hanging drapes, matching wood, stretching carpet and coaxing green things into life on the grounds outside. And when darkness has fallen they knock off. Sometimes they just collapse and have their dinner lounging on the huge bed while (Continued on page 74)

full house—full hearts

(Continued from page 37) then helped a little boy down the steps, a boy who tottered uncomfortably in shiny new cowboy boots. Hey—who was that kid?

Then Dusty saw his mom, Dale Evans, step out. She too waved with one arm, but in the other—Dusty really puckered his brow—what was she holding—a baby? Dale started down the steps carefully, gingerly, as if she were carrying the most precious package in all the world.

"Okay," grunted the guard, sliding open the gate. In a sec Dusty Rogers had tackled his Daddy's skin tight pants and was shinnying up his leg. Roy grabbed him and swung him up with one arm—and with the other hoisted the little stranger on his shoulder, too.

"Told you we'd be home for your birthday," he chuckled. "And here we are!"

"Bring me a present?" Dusty wanted to know pronto.

"Sure did," grinned Roy happily. "Here's your birthday present, Son. A brand new brother! Dusty, this is Sandy. He's come to our house to stay."

There was an awkward moment of silence as the two tow-heads sized up each other. Then Sandy cracked his shy face in a wide grin. He stuck out a small hand tentatively. "Hiyah, podner!" he said.

"Howdy," said Dusty slowly, cocking his thumbs. "Reach for the sky, Stranger!"

Roy eased his two boys to the ground and watched them race away. Then he looked across at Dale. Already her precious bundle was the center of a loving melee. "Our baby! Our baby!—Let me hold her!" Linda shrieked.

"No—me, me! I'm older. I know how!" cried Cheryl.

"Careful, careful," warned their mother. "She's just a little girl, just seven months old. Our Little Doe. There, gently now. . ."

Roy Rogers caught the eyes of his wife. They were full, just like her heart. He took her hand and pressed it softly. He couldn't see so well himself just then. But he cleared his throat and addressed the bobbing, excited heads below him—all five of them. "Git along, little dogies," he laughed. "We're goin' home now. And we're gonna have the best birthday party there ever was tonight—with all the ice cream and cake everybody can eat!"

ORDINARILY, you wouldn't associate a blessed event with an airport. But that happy Hollywood homecoming of Roy and Dale Rogers with their new children, Sandy and Little Doe, on an afternoon last fall was a blessed event in all that that overworked phrase implies. For Roy and Dale it was even more than that. It was a miracle, because only six weeks before Roy and Dale had flown away from that very airport with hearts heavy enough to weight down the wings of the DC-6. They had left because they had to carry on in their demanding show business lives; because they had engagements in the East that couldn't be cancelled. But it was a heart-wrenching take-off, a desolate, painful time for Roy and Dale to leave their home and children. Only a few days before, the one baby of their marriage, their little girl, Robin Elizabeth, had sickened suddenly and died, two days before her second birthday. On that birthday, they had buried her.

Roy and Dale's grief was no less consuming and their loss no less poignant because that tragedy had long threatened. From her birth on August 26, 1950, little Robin had lived in the shadow of the dark angel's wings, because she was born with a congenital heart defect that could not be repaired.

Such handicapped babies, Dale Evans now firmly believes, are messengers from God, and she has written a book on that theme, in little Robin's words, reporting to her Maker about her stay on earth and His message which she delivered to the Rogers family. Although she had written nothing before in her life, it came in easily flowing text. She finished it in three weeks, even while travelling. It's called "Angel Unawares" from the text of Hebrews 13:2—"Be not forgetful to entertain strangers; for thereby some have entertained angels unawares. . . ." It will be published this Easter. Dale started writing it the day after Robin was laid to rest.

Roy watched the girl he loves anxiously in the days after little Robin was laid to rest. He saw her plunge industri-ously into tidying up the house, getting the children's clothes ready for the approaching school term, hovering over them and doing myriad things he knew they could do for themselves. He watched her sit at her desk and write furiously on the book that would receive Robin's message and send it on to those who need it, to other handicapped children and to sorrowing parents. He knew she was seeking release for her own pent up sorrow, and while those things were indeed an emotional escape hatch he knew they were not enough. He put his arms around her one day in the week after Robin died.

"Honey," he said, "why don't we get that little boy we've been planning to get? Now's the time, isn't it?"

Dale knew that what Roy meant was the playmate for Dusty they had planned for over a year to adopt, ever since Dusty's teacher at pre-school had pointed out to them the obvious psychological signs of a need. Dusty wasn't getting along right with the other boys. He was acting up in telltale ways that bespoke female domination. "Dusty needs a brother," she suggested, and both Roy and Dale agreed. Roy remembered his own lonely boyhood on the farm in Duck Run, Ohio, with three sisters, but no brother. His kids come first in his heart as they do Dale's, and have ever since she married widowed Roy and took over his children to mother in a warm, loving way that makes "step-mother" a cold and inaccurate word.

SO WHILE they had talked about the family addition, they had not yet discovered the boy they wanted. But now, in her anguish, Roy mentioned it. Dale shook her head. "No," she said, "nobody can take the place of Robin." Dale thought she meant what she said and in a way she did. Nobody can take the place of any child a mother loses. But there must be a place for that thwarted mother love to find a home. Roy knew that, but he didn't press the issue. He tried another tack.

"Maybe," he mentioned, "you'd kind of like to see your own folks right now."

"Yes," Dale said, "I would."

"Fine!" he took her right up. "We'll leave right away, before we're due at the Garden. We'll go by Texas and see your mom and dad, then on to Mississippi and visit your brother. Think it'll do us a lot of good."

So they were aboard the plane and neither saying much, both with thoughts too deep for words, but none about filling the gap in their family. Planwise, they were as up in the air as the droning craft that bore them. Then suddenly Dale found herself saying, "I wonder if that little Indian girl is still at the Home."

"Bet she is," brightened Roy.

"She was so cute," Dale thought out loud, "so full of life. I held her. And she laughed. She seemed to like me. I could feel her heart beat right against mine. Her little body was ivory brown. She was part Choctaw."

"So'm I," Roy carried the ball. "My great-great-grandma was a full-blooded Choctaw. Now, that's a coincidence, isn't it?"

"She had the brightest black eyes, but soft. Like a little doe's," Dale went on. "Little Doe"—wouldn't that make a cute name?"

"Little Doe—yeah—Little Doe Rogers. . ."

Roy gave a cautious glance at his wife.

IT was just last spring that she had visited the children's adoption home in Dallas. She had taken Cheryl, the daughter Roy and his first wife, Arlene, had adopted from there 12 years before. They visited the ward for babies under three months. There were 42 there, she remembered now, thinking back, but for her there had been just one star of the group. That was this little Indian baby, a dusky little gem with hypnotic attraction. Her bright eyes flashed like black diamonds, and she felt them following her around the room. When she looked back she saw the tiny mite raise up on her elbows and peer. She heard her chortle and squeal with eagerness, and saw her bob her black shock of hair up and down.

"We call her Mary," the nurse smiled.

Dale remembered being drawn back irresistibly time and again to that crib and that entrancing little Indian papoose. The nurse had lifted her up at last and Dale had reached out her arms.

"It's against the rules to hold them."

"Pooh to the rules!" Dale had said. And she'd held her, very close, thinking, at the time, of her own little girl at home.

When she left that day she had breathed, "Goodbye little Pocahontas. Bye-bye little deer." The eyes followed her to the door, and seemingly for a long time past it. "I hope she finds the right home," she'd told the nurse earnestly. "I'll pray that little Mary does." And she had.

All this Dale Evans recalled as she sped toward Texas, and all of it seemed to her now like a vision. But she didn't say anything to Roy about it, not then. She wanted to be sure; she didn't want to ask for disappointment. She couldn't take another disappointment, not right now.

They were walking up the stairs of the children's adoption home together when fear clutched her breast and she gripped Roy's arm. "Do you suppose she's still here?" Dale voiced her anxiety out loud. He smiled, because he knew what she was after then, although she still hadn't told him. "She's here," he said. Roy knew she had to be there. And she was.

"Yes," affirmed the receiving nurse. "We've still got Mary. She's had all her tests and she's ready to go out for adoption, any minute now." Dale quickened her steps; she couldn't walk fast enough. She knew, now, that it was the hand of God which had guided her there—in time.

And there Mary was, the little doe, with the same sparkling black eyes, the same hair sticking up like a tiny, feathered war bonnet, with two shiny new teeth below, five months old by now and making the crib rattle. When she spied Dale, she gave out a shrill, gurgling cry. "War whoop," grinned Roy.

They held her again, both of them, and she almost bounced out of Roy's arms to the floor. She was life, she was resurrection. "I want her," Dale told the nurse suddenly. "I love her. I need her. Can I have her?"

"We'll see what we can do," she was promised, "but, of course, this is very sudden. . . . The superintendent's away on vacation. We couldn't do anything about it today. And you say you're leaving tomorrow. Why don't you keep in touch with us?"

Then followed the days of suspense. Roy and Dale went on to Jackson, Mississippi, to visit her brother, Hillman, and his family. She called the adoption home the night they got in. The superintendent was still away. "Please," Dale begged, "keep Mary for me. I asked first." She wired the same plea almost every night from New York.

But for long days there was no answer. And in those days Dale felt the reins on her emotions fraying thin. She went on with the show—the rodeo at Madison Square Garden, even though each night, walking from her dressing room to the chutes, she clenched her fists until her nails cut the palms, trying to control herself. The trouble she had been through was telling on her at last; she felt the dam was about to burst.

Then one night the phone call came from the Home. "The baby's yours," the superintendent said. "Won't you pick her up on your way home from the tour?"

Dale jumped from the phone and landed in Roy's arms. The King of the Cowboys let out a "Ki-yippee" that pierced Broadway's roar, and from then on Dale knew she would sleep like a baby. But there was another sign soon to come, too. In fact, it was that very night that Roy, in his happiness at Dale's recovery and the news about their new daughter, came out with it: "Now," he said, "let's find our boy, too!"

It seemed a rash, impossible project. But after all, to find a new girl for the nursery that little Robin had left, in hardly more than a month after she went away, was some kind of a miracle. Miracles, they knew now, could happen. The first already had and before many days had passed the second arrived.

It was in Cincinnati, the last city of their tour. One night stands, that a telephone call came. A woman who kept orphans for the county was on the wire from Covington, Kentucky, across the Ohio River. Her own daughter, Penny, a little girl stricken with cerebral palsy, had read about Roy's arrival. Television was about Penny's arrival, and on television her hero was Roy Rogers. She wondered if she could bring her over to meet him. It would mean so much.

"I'll say you can," Roy assured her. "You're my guests at the show today, and after that I'll have a big pow-wow in my dressing room." Then, he had a sudden inspiration: "You don't happen to have a five-year-old boy at your place, do you?" he asked.

Yes, she answered, she did. She had Larry, a little orphan from a Kentucky farm. But he had suffered from malnutrition as a baby, he'd had rickets, he didn't walk too well. "Can you bring him along too?" asked Roy.

They were in the dressing room when Penny was rolled in, and beside her wheel chair walked a shy little tow-head, undersized in body but with oversized blue eyes and a double measure grin. It must have been an overpowering sight for the two little handicapped waifs to see Roy Rogers there in full cowboy trappings, butterfly boots and spurs, holsters, guns, and fancy Hollywood rig—and Dale Evans the same. It must have been like a visitation straight from fairyland. But the little guy, dazzled as he was, didn't lose control.

"Hiyah, podner!" he said.

Roy grinned, "Well, I'll be doggined—a real cowhand! Say—what's my horse's name, know that?"

"Trigger," answered Harry.

Roy lifted the frail little fellow up on his knee, chatted with him, encouraging him. To most people little Harry wouldn't have seemed a prize personality boy. When Dale took off his shoes and had him run around the room in his stocking feet, he was awkward, with the legs that had got such a poor start. He had a cold. After his first greeting he didn't talk much—cat got his tongue. He wasn't a little boy beautiful, he was just boy. But those were the very things that lodged him in Dale and Roy Rogers' hearts.

"You know," said Roy, after they'd left, "that little guy reminds me of myself when I was a shy, awkward farm kid, too. He kind of gets next to me."

It was a serious decision they had to make—and a fast one. They would be doubling their new responsibility. They already had their new baby daughter waiting for them in Dallas. And if they wanted this little undersized, underprivileged boy too, they would have to make up their minds that night. They were leaving at ten o'clock in the morning.

Roy and Dale skipped dinner. They went to their hotel and ordered up warm milk, cheese and crackers. They talked it all over, and there was a lot to talk about. True, there was much they didn't know about this little waif on such short acquaintance. But still there was enough. After all, he was a child of the Lord, just like their own. If he had needs, they would supply them. If he was weak, they would make him strong. That would be the joy of it, that was what clinched the decision in Roy's mind. It was past midnight when he spoke his mind.

"Let's take him. Anybody in the world would take a strong, healthy boy. But if we can help a little fellow without a chance get a decent start in life—then we're doing something important. I just wouldn't feel right now about going on and leaving him."

It was one o'clock when they called the welfare officer and got him out of bed to make the hurry-up arrangements. Next morning at eight they drove across the river and—in one short hour—had completed the papers, picked up Sandy—their new name for him—rolled back and packed. By ten they were off on their bus, and Sandy Rogers was so excited he couldn't hold the lunch he ate, was sick all the miles to Muncie, where they stopped the night. But Sandy said he'd make up for that, "I can chop weeds," he told Roy eagerly. "I can feed the chickens. I can lock the gate so the cow won't get out on your ranch."

"You're hired," grinned Roy. "The minute we get home you can show your stuff."

By now Sandy and Dodie Rogers are as at home on the Bar-Double-R as if they had been born there. By now "Mommy" and "Dad" come as easy to Sandy's lips as if they'd been the first words he learned. By now Dusty Rogers has taken over his kid brother and revealed the wonders of the ranch. They've climbed the big oak tree, played Indians in the cornfield, snatched the grapes, figs and the brown walnuts, learned the names of all the coon hounds. Because, on his six acres of San Fernando soil, Roy Rogers has packed about everything that a real ranch should have, and it's a wonderland for a boy, especially a boy who has a brother to explore it with. There isn't a cow to keep inside the gate—but there are sheep, with new lambs to pet, and chickens, geese, ducks, 17 dogs, uncounted cats and a corral full of real cow horses. Why, even "Trigger" comes when Sandy calls him, and the day his dad, Roy Rogers, lifted him right up into the silvered saddle—how close to Paradise can a boy get?

Already Sandy has sprouted up like a jimpson weed, filled out and toughened up with the affection, food and fun in his new home. Dale took him to her pediatrician the first thing. "Nothing wrong with this boy that good care and family love won't cure," he announced. Well, that the Rogers' have in abundance. As for Little Doe, the doc pronounced both a rave and a warning. "You picked a real prize this time," he told Dale. "But don't put her in a picture. You won't have a chance."

Since the arrival of Sandy and Little Doe, whom they call "Little Princess" most of the time, life has taken on a new meaningful tempo for Roy and Dale with a hum that unmistakably announces busy happiness. "I always wanted at least five children," says Dale, who comes from a small two-child family herself. "And now, look—I have seven!" When Dale counts them, of course, she counts not only all her living brood (her son, Tom Fox, is now 22), but little Robin, too, who though gone, will always be with her in the way, she is now sure, she was intended to be from the start.

For to Roy and Dale Rogers, there is no essential difference between heaven and earth, life and the spirit—and especially do they feel this way since their sudden sadness has been translated into sudden joy. Their religion is an inseparable part of their lives, as the crowded car with Roy at the wheel and the four Rogers kids behind him rolling off to Sunday School each week plainly reveals. As Roy and Dale's earnest participation in the Hollywood Christian Group also testifies and as, daily, their unselfish actions prove.

But it is not entirely for the future good of their souls that Dale and Roy Rogers want their house to ring with the shouts and happy laughter of children. Paradoxically, there is a selfish reason, too. "Both Roy and I have found that we're happiest when we're crowded with responsibilities," Dale will tell you. "We don't have time to think of ourselves then, and people who never think of themselves never worry, never have fears."

In Hollywood, which is notably ridden with both worries and fears, Roy and Dale seem to have found the best prescription for happiness—and it's an open prescription that requires no doctor's order to fill.

But to use it successfully, you need a heart that is strong in faith and with many welcoming chambers. There are houses in Hollywood far greater in size than the one which Dale and Roy Rogers occupy. But there are mighty few hearts that hold as much room. Right now Dale and Roy's house is full to bursting—and so are their hearts. And that, they both know, is their miracle.

It is not only like a religion, this house which I love but am not in; it is like my religion, my own church which I love but am not in.

The House I Love

by DEAN MARTIN

■ After dinner evenings you can always find me sitting on the front steps of the house. I have always liked to do it—now more so than ever. I was brought up in Steubenville, Ohio. Like a lot of kids from that part of the country, I used to tell myself that someday I would own a white-pillared, Colonial mansion like the kind the rich folks in town lived in. But when a time came, years later, to buy a home in Hollywood, things didn't work out so I could get such a place. Not to live in. But the reason I bought the home I did, which cost a young fortune, was because right across the street from it stood my dream-mansion, handsome and stately with its white pillars and green gables, which cost nothing to look at.

Night after night I sat and looked at it, and one night my wife said, "You know, it's like a religion with you . . . that house." And she didn't know how symbolically right she was. (Continued on page 98)

"You suppose we could look inside?" June asked cautiously.

"I think so," Dick said. "Some real estate agent told me it's up for sale."

THEY entered the pleasant old farmhouse, and what June saw made her feel good and warm and pleasant. The golden tones of the pine-paneled living room, for example, "made me feel," she explained later, "as relaxed and happy as a kitten." She liked the unpretentiousness of the simple stone fireplace, the big square windows, the plank floors. June is a very emotional young woman and as she walked from room to room eyeing the grandmotherly kitchen, the bedroom fireplace, and the glass-enclosed porch, tears of delight began to well up in her eyes. Everything about this house was warmer, more intimate, more home-like than the rather austere environment of the English manor house they'd been living in for five years.

"Oh! Richard! If we could only buy this house, we'd never have to build another one—ever."

Dick cocked his head to one side. "You really like it that much?"

"Yes, Richard. I think it's just fine."

"I'm glad, darling, because we own it." He threw the line away, underplaying the scene deliberately.

June couldn't believe it, wouldn't believe it. Dick had to show her the bill of sale and explain that, "I traded our old house and quite a lot of dough for this farm and 56 acres of land."

That evening, June insisted that Dick go over the purchasing of "The Farm" step by step. "I was like a little girl," she says, "wanting to hear her favorite story over and over again."

ACCORDING to Dick, his interest in the property had its origin back in the late 1920's. In those days he was a farmboy from Mountain View, Arkansas, who'd been brought west by Warner Brothers, that is, after he'd pulled several years on the road as a singer and emcee.

"Those were the days," he recalls, "when the stars and the movie moguls really used to live it up out here. And boy! How I was impressed. I was doing fairly well in some of those early Warner musicals, and because screen success and social success usually go hand in hand, I was invited to a number of parties and social functions."

"Of all the homes I saw, the one that left a lasting impression was a Pennsylvania Dutch farmhouse owned by Bernie Hyman. He was Irving Thalberg's assistant, and I don't know how much dough he spent on the house. But it was plenty. Back then the hills in the Mandeville section were wild and undeveloped, and the 56 acres were stocked with chickens, horses, cows, not to mention the deer and jack rabbits."

"Bernie had plenty of money at the time, and he didn't mind spending it on the house. For example, the movie projection system in the living room cost him $40,000. His kitchen had a walk-in refrigerator as large as a butcher shop, and there was a dumb-waiter that ran to the second floor. There was also a separate guest house for relatives and friends."

"I remember saying to myself first time I went through the house, 'If you ever get any dough, this is the house you must buy.' But I knew I'd have to wait."

Eventually the house and land were purchased by John Charles Thomas, the well-known concert singer. When June and Dick were married seven years ago, Dick made another attempt to buy "The Farm." It failed. "In a way," he says, "it's a good thing, because what could a pair of newlyweds do with a 12-room house and 56 acres of land?"

In the years they've been married, June has learned how to run a large household with adequate competence. She is no longer the frightened, bewildered little city girl who came to Hollywood with a great big inferiority complex. Success, marriage, money and fame have all contributed to a bolstering of her ego. And Dick has recognized this fact.

"A couple of weeks ago," he told his wife, "I heard that the Thomas place was on the market. I acted on a hunch. I offered them our house in trade, because you know yourself how people hate to give up one home before they've found another. Thomas liked my offer, but I was afraid to talk to you about it, because there were a lot of hitches, and I thought that maybe the deal would fall through."

June edged her way into Dick's arms to kiss him. "I'm glad you kept it a secret. It's the most beautiful surprise since Ricky."

AS THIS article goes to press, the Powells have been living in their new home only five weeks. They plan to make many changes and improvements, but to forge ahead slowly. The proof of a good house is in the living, and living on "The Farm" is a better life than the one Dick and June ever dreamed of.

In June's own words, "Our farm is an improvement over the Bel-Air house in every way. Specifically, it's better for the children, better environment for their growing up. The tempo is slower and safer than in a traffic-jammed district. Richard and I both feel that it's a good thing for children to develop in the company of other growing things. Pam and Ricky are going to share their growing up with chickens and sheep, and dogs and horses and maybe a calf or two."

June Allyson is most at peace with the world when her children are happy, but right now the new house has given her an abundance of peace in her own right. She was never particularly happy competing in the fashionable suburban life of Bel-Air. She was always a little on edge, a bit nervous, and frightened, but in her new surroundings, the tension has disappeared. She can be herself, completely relaxed in blue jeans.

"Another thing—" she adds, "you ought to see the way friends just drop in on us out here. In our old place we used to give parties, expensively catered deals with all the trimmings. Lots of times they were very stiff, very dull. No one relaxed. But you know something? The first Sunday we moved here, 15 friends drove out to see us and practically all of them stayed for a pick-up supper. I raided some spare bricks from the front yard, and Richard rigged up a makeshift grill in the living room fireplace. We cooked hot dogs, and it was more fun than a circus. It's been that way every weekend since we got here."

From Dick's viewpoint, "The Farm" is not only the fulfillment of a long-term desire, it is also a project for the future. "I hope to keep maybe half-a-dozen acres," he says. "The rest of it I'll subdivide. With a little luck I figure we can sell the lots for as much as we paid for the whole deal (approximately $200,000). I want to sell the lots to friends with families, so that Pam and Ricky can have other children nearby. I'm also going to start a plant nursery and get some sheep to eat back the weeds. We should have more than 1,000 chickens in a week or two and they should be worth a few bucks."

POWELL, who is one of the shrewdest money-managers in Hollywood, has all the future details worked out except one. He can't decide whether to stock his lake with fish or keep it as a swimming hole.

"Whatever Powell touches," one of his friends points out, "it's sure to turn to gold. This guy has more financial brains than any other actor in the business. I've been out to his new farm. I've seen all the chickens and land, and it looks very nice to me. But the only thing I'm sure of is that Dick will make a great profit on it."

"It sure is funny, the difference between him and June. She knows nothing about money. Maybe you won't believe this, but June doesn't even know her own salary. Dick makes all the big decisions, all the big investments for their family, and pretty darn good ones, too. June doesn't know about it, but some of her money has been invested in oil leases in Texas, Oklahoma, California, and Nebraska. Dick has also organized a television company, 'The Four-Star Playhouse' with Charles Boyer, Ronald Colman, Joel McCrea and himself. That's one of the company's programs. They've already sold it to the Singer Sewing Machine people. Another is the 'My Hero' series, starring Bob Cummings."

"I'm telling you, Powell is a frustrated businessman, and I think June recognizes that fact, too. That's why she was so happy when he finally landed his first job as a director. He's directing Split Second for RKO, you know, with Steve McNally and Jan Sterling, and Dore Scharly is willing to give him a chance to direct at Metro. Maybe I should say that Dick Powell is a frustrated creative businessman, because "creative" is certainly the key word in his makeup."

If "creative" best describes Dick Powell, then "adaptive" is probably the key adjective pertaining to his wife.

When June looked at the farmhouse Dick had bought for their family, she said very quickly, "I don't think we'll have to buy any new furniture at all. I think everything we have will fit. What doesn't, we'll adapt."

June was right. Outside of a few gifts, the grandfather clock in the hall given to them by decorator Paul Granard, and a coffee samovar in its own niche near the fireplace, June as yet hasn't had to buy one new stick of furniture.

"Positively amazing," says Granard. "We took the furnishings from their two previous homes, and they look better in this background than they've ever looked before. The heavy oak tables, the braided rugs, the English chintz, they all go beautifully with the stone and natural wood finishes of the rooms downstairs."

There are changes to come, of course, but like most good wives, June hopes to bring them in unobtrusively. "Some time this year," she says, "I'm going to change my pink bedroom to all green and white. I think I've kind of outgrown that little-girl pink."

JUNE has outgrown many other things, too—her desire to retire from movies, her fear of large crowds, her basic insecurity, all her self-doubts as to her efficiency as a wife, mother, and actress. And all this is relatively new.

"I believe," says a middle-aged lady who once worked as her housekeeper, "that in buying that old Thomas farmhouse, Dick Powell has done one of the smartest things in his life. He's given June a place where she really feels at home."

Not too long ago, for example, they came to the Mocambo for Gloria De Haven's opening. Gloria has the kind of figure that gives many other women inferiority complexes and leaves men too breathless to whistle. But did Lamas focus on this gorgeous eyeful? He was politely attentive, casting Gloria a sideward glance or two, but his eyes feasted on Arlene with unsated hunger; his strong, thin fingers curled themselves around her arm. Here was a study of a man who saw what he wanted and wanted what he saw.

A few nights later at Chuck Walters' party, Lamas was again in action. The living room was filled with beautiful, provocative, gorgeously-gowned females. But for the son of Maria and Emilio Lamas that night, all the women in the world were non-existent except for Arlene. "Each time I look at you," he whispered into her hair, "I see you with my heart."

Arlene turned and smiled. Her hand entwined itself in his in an unspoken echo.

DOLORES del Rio, one of the world's most beautiful women, who played opposite Lamas in the Argentine version of Lady Windemere's Fan, in 1948, was once asked about the young actor in Buenos Aires. "Fernando," she said, "has the most soulful eyes I have ever seen. When he is playing a tender love scene, you cannot help believing him. He has the kind of eyes that are irresistible to most women."

Lamas is the type of lover who is always playing love scenes with or without the benefit of a motion picture camera.

"He makes me feel," Arlene Dahl says, "as if the whole world was bathed in sunshine and goodness."

Elizabeth Taylor, who only recently finished a picture with Fernando, when told of Arlene's statement, said, "I agree with her completely. Fernando is really wonderful."

Even Esther Williams, whose entire interest in men revolves about the colossal proportions of her husband, Ben Gage, has been impressed by the Lamas charm. "We did Dangerous When Wet a few weeks ago," Esther recalls, "and Lamas is dangerous wet or dry."

Similarly enthusiastic about the Latin lover is Denise Darcel. "How can you describe Fernando?" she asks. "He has the heart of Casanova, the eyes of Don Juan, the profile of John Barrymore. I know the words in French, but in English it is very difficult for me to express. He is all jammed up with what you would call it—sex appeal."

Chroniclers of the Hollywood scene may consider the sources of such quotations surprising. After all, only a few short months ago, Fernando had been staked out, surveyed, and mortgaged to Lana Turner. "There is only one man in my life that counts," Lana said at that point, "and that man is Fernando Lamas."

You remember, I'm sure, how rumors of their imminent marriage abounded in every screenland salon and saloon. It was just a question of a few legal difficulties before Lana divorced Bob Topping and took unto her self this troubador tenor.

Although more circumspect than usual, Lana made no secret of the fact that she had given her heart to Fernando, that she regarded him as the one great love in her life, that here at last was the end-fulfillment of all her hopes and dreams.

As for Lamas, he, too, made no secret of his love for Lana. "I cannot discuss marriage," he truthfully told reporters, "when I am not yet divorced from my wife; so please don't ask me when I am going to marry Miss Turner." But, then, Lydia Lamas, the beautiful and intelligent Scotch-Italian girl, who had married Fernando in Montevideo in 1946, went to Las Vegas and returned with a divorce. This time the reporters descended on Fernando again and said, "Okay, you're free now. When are you and Lana gonna make it legal?"

Lamas, who is liked very much by the Hollywood press corps, merely grinned and shrugged his shoulders. "I am free—yes," he agreed, "only Miss Turner is not."

WHAT Fernando did not say at that particular time, however, was that the great love he and Lana had kindled between them was no longer blazing brightly. In fact its intensity had begun to diminish even before the celebrated quarrel at the Marion Davies party.

There are many stories in circulation as to what caused the rupture in the Lana-Fernando relationship. One would have you believe that Lamas grew insane with jealousy when he saw his lovely sweetheart dancing with Lex Barker. Another canard is that Lamas, for many years one of the great amateur boxers in Argentina, so lost his temper that night that he not only swung at Lex, but also jabbed Lana with a fast left.

All of this is ridiculous, of course. There is no doubt but what Fernando and Lana quarreled during and after the Marion Davies party. I was there and I heard them. But let's face it—it takes more than one quarrel, no matter how violent, to dissolve a year-long love affair.

The simple truth is that the love affair was dying. Had Lana Turner agreed to divorce Bob Topping immediately after he strayed from the true and narrow path; had she secured her freedom quickly instead of trying to wrangle a fair and equitable financial settlement, she might be Mrs. Fernando Lamas today. For make no mistake about it, this past summer Lana had her Latin boy groggy with love.

When she flew up to Zephyr Cove, Nevada, with her daughter, Cheryl, for a vacation, Fernando, despite the fact that he was working six days a week, would fly up on the seventh just to be near her.

It was at this time, as a matter of fact, that he entered into divorce discussions with his estranged Lydia.

He wanted Lana badly. Each night after he finished work on the set, he would phone her, tell her all that he did that day, exchange small endearments—nothing important was said, but the phone calls always left him spiritually at peace . . . temporarily, at least.

IT is a sad truth, but as regards Fernando Lamas and marriage, Lana Turner missed the boat. She should have struck while the iron was hot, passion was seething, desire knew no reason.

Instead, for the first time in her life she let love come last. She relegated it to a subsidiary position, placing it after her daughter's welfare, her career, and money—and, in the process of relegation, it died.

Of all the women Lamas has known in his life, Lana is the only one who, at this juncture, is not his friend. His two former wives, for example, speak of him glowingly. Azuzena Mus, his first, once told a La Prensa reporter, "Fernando is a young man of character and integrity, and mark my word, he will make a place for himself in the world one day. He has talent and will-power. He was a good husband to me."

Lydia Babacci Lamas, who lives in Beverly Hills and has custody of their daughter, Alexandra, a six-year-old beauty with large, luminous brown eyes, has said time and again, "Although we are divorced, Fernando and I are very great friends. He is not to blame that our marriage did not work. We were separated by circumstances, and I grew very nervous. It is all over with now, but any woman will look long and far before she finds someone as thoughtful and considerate as Fernando. He is of Spanish descent, you know; and he has all the fire of those people."

WITH Lana Turner irrevocably lost—although there is a large school of Hollywood masterminds which believes that if he were to knock on Turner's front door today, she would gladly let him in—Fernando, last October, began to wonder about whom he would take to the MODERN SCREEN party. This is one of the outstanding social functions of the year in Hollywood during which the most popular actors and actresses are awarded sterling silver plates, bowls, cups, scrolls, certificates and other tributes and acknowledgments of their popularity.

When Fernando was told that he was scheduled to receive an award as one of the year's most up-and-coming players, he phoned Arlene Dahl and asked if she would accompany him.

Why Arlene Dahl?

The vicious gossips say it was because he wanted to wreak his vengeance on Lex Barker from whom Arlene had just secured a divorce. But that's only gossip.

"Why did I call Arlene?" Lamas asks. "Very simple. A few years ago when first reported to MGM, I could hardly speak any English. The studio gave me a marvelous instructress, Gertrude Fogler. In a few months I was ready to make a screen test in English. To play opposite me in this test, George Sidney, the great director—he asked Arlene Dahl. Now, Arlene did not have to do it. After all, I was a nobody and making tests is not much fun. But you know what Arlene said? She said 'I would love to do it.' She was so gracious so feminine; she was so helpful to me, perfect stranger, that my heart went out to her in gratitude.

"She was so kind during the test. She saw that I had the benefit of her wisdom and experience. And she is such a beauty—not only in the face but in the soul as well—that I remember saying to myself 'Fernando, here is one girl you will never forget.' And I didn't.

"When I phoned and asked her if she'd like to go with me to the MODERN SCREEN party, she accepted. I have been going with her ever since. I do not want to speak of love or affection or anything like that—but to me Arlene Dahl is a woman in every sense of the word. She is what one might call classically feminine."

What does Arlene Dahl think of her new lovelight? "I'm extremely fond of Fernando," she says. "We've seen each other quite frequently. As a matter of fact, he's practically the only one I've seen. Don't get any wrong impressions. I've been working on Here Come The Girls. It's got a ten-week shooting schedule. I don't think I have a day off; so that I don't really have too much time for a hectic social life."

"I'm not denying, however, that I've seen Fernando a good many times. What will come of it I don't know. My divorce won't be final until next year. In the meanwhile he's a lot of fun to be with, much more versatile than you'd think. He's got a good mind; he's a great athlete; he sings beautifully; he's very handsome; and he dances divinely."

There are some cynics who say that Fernando and Arlene are using each other that they both came along at the right time, that one needed a man and the other a woman. Others claim that this is merely a case in point of a double rebound, Fernando from Lana, and Arlene from Lex.

This isn't particularly true. If it were, just a question of needing someone of the opposite sex, Fernando and Arlene might easily have their pick. Arlene, after her divorce, began dating Greg Bautzer, the world's champion escort of beautiful women, but that lasted for only two dates. Once Lamas came into the picture, Bautzer was shunted to the showers.

Lamas admits that he needs someone like Arlene Dahl. The reason for this is essentially psychological and has its roots in his background. His father died of pneumonia when he was one; and his mother of peritonitis when he was four. As a youngster he was raised by two 70-year-old grandmothers who shared his custody. He has no brothers, no sisters, and in his youth there was a conspicuous lack of young feminine beauty. There is a possibility that his single-minded devotion to one beautiful woman at a time is to compensate for his motherless childhood.

Whatever the reason, whatever the motivation, the fact remains that Fernando Lamas is one of the truly great lovers in the world today. A make-up man at MGM, when he heard recently that Lamas had been replaced by Ricardo Montalban to star opposite Lana Turner in Latin Lovers, said sadly, "Montalban's a good performer—he'll do fine in the picture—but not so well by Lana personally. Just imagine Lana Turner in a film with that Lamas. Maybe she hates his guts; maybe she can't stand the sight of him, but the scene calls for them to make passionate love. He takes her in his arms, her antagonism melts away, gradually they melt into a kiss. I'm telling you they'd be back together in a minute and the picture would gross ten million bucks. Lana has a great earthy quality. She belongs to a guy like Lamas. Not that I have anything against his new girl friend, Arlene Dahl. It's just that somehow to me she doesn't seem capable of real, downright passion. She should be going with some Greek god like Apollo. But who knows? Maybe Lamas can warm her up—he's a walking generator." END

(Fernando Lamas will soon be seen in MGM's The Girl Who Had Everything.)

cinderella's tired

(Continued from page 29) I don't know another man and woman with less in common. Aly the playboy, Rita the retiring. One the extrovert. The other tongue-tied and shy. Aly loves horses, gambling and women, in that order. He's a spendthrift, a night-clubber, cannot bear to be alone.

Rita is none of these things. But it was cruel to call her a peasant, because, to quote her third husband—"At eight o'clock at night the only thing she's interested in is putting on her slippers and sitting by the fire. She ignores night life and is not interested in social life. She's a homebody."

Since when is it wrong to want to live quietly with the man you love, to build understanding and companionship away from the glitter of the phoney and the frivolous, to build a home for children in which the parents stay? This was Rita's long-standing dream. And to make it materialize with Aly, she was willing to toss aside a million-dollar movie career, to live in his country, to put him first in all her plans. And for this she's called a peasant and immature. At 33 she's more mature than the 40-plus Aly will ever be. I tip my hat to her. She tried.

If she'd been 29—and done the slippers-by-the-fire routine, that would have been different. At 20 she didn't. She loved nightclubs then. And a long string of beaux took her dancing—from Tony Martin to Vic Mature. In fact, one reason she paid alimony to Ed Judson was reportedly because he presented a long list of dancing partners to Rita's lawyer and threatened to splash 'em on the front pages. Now Rita and Ed are friends again, but I don't think she'll ever forgive him. And I don't think she'll forgive Aly for the present humiliation.

THERE are so many conflicting stories. His friends tell me he was very generous with Rita. But hers say the reverse. Let's study His and Hers. His: He gave her an engagement ring that cost between $50,000 and $100,000. And a diamond bracelet and earrings to match. Bought her racehorses. Opened charge accounts with world-famous Parisian coutouriers. And when he was in Hollywood that last time, he gave her the cash to buy the most expensive make of Cadillac.

Hers: When Rita first left Aly, I asked her, "Did you bring back a lot of jewelry?" "Nothing that I didn't have before," she replied—"except this." And she showed me a gold St. Christopher medal with half a dozen very small diamonds on the edge. "But what happened to the flawless engagement ring?" I wanted to know. "She had to sell the ring to help pay Aly's debts," I was told.

This is for sure. When she returned to her movie career she was too broke to buy a house, and her agent had to advance cash for everyday living. And one of these days I'll ask Rita what happened to the $55,000 that Aly's business associate here collected for the sale of her Brentwood home. Her pals insist she gave it to Aly. And she corroborated it in October when she complained —"He's a playboy who spends his time and my money at race-tracks and casinos while I slave making pictures."

They call Rita money-mad because she held out for a huge settlement for Yasmin. She isn't mercenary, she's obstinate. And you don't need an X-ray to see the workings of her mind. If Aly's two sons by his previous marriage can get a three-million-dollar trust fund each from him, then their daughter is surely worth just as much. Okay, so Moslems don't think a daughter's so hot. Rita's American, and girls in this country rate as much as boys.

It's a secret how much mother and lawyer were able to shake loose for the little girl, but you can bet your bottom dollar that the check was signed by Aly's aged father, who wanted the divorce settled and done with, just as much as he wanted the marriage in the first place. Then, to kill the scandal of their world wide wanderings. Now, to keep their marital shennanigans from continuing to shock his Moslem followers who pay to keep him in the style in which he couldn't live without.

THERE are also two schools of thought as to exactly how much money Aly can call his own. Her friends insist he hasn't a dime except the expense account he gets from Pop, that he is always broke, that he owed $100,000 to the little Casino in Monte Carlo for a year and that's why he has to gamble in the big Casino!

But Aly's buddies reveal that in the horse department alone, in which the Prince is in 50-50 with the Aga Khan, he could get $10,000,000 tomorrow for his share, and that recently he bought a huge tract of property worth trillions, between Cannes and Monte Carlo. Also that he owns five huge homes in his own right. That he has a yacht, an airplane, servants by the score, and simply fabulous inheritance prospects.

Well, even unlimited coffers or credit can scrape bottom if you take out all the time, without putting anything back. It happens with mother nature and it can happen with father spendthrift. And, perish the thought, what if the toiling, moiling peoples who supply the income for Aly's wonder way of life were to turn off the golden flow suddenly? I guess the pampered playboy would have to work. Even as Rita has worked since she was 12 years old to reach her present pinnacle of success.

It's a mystery to me why she ever wanted this man. She needs him like a hole in her check book. But she wanted him all right. And it's true she wanted the reconciliation, whereas Aly merely didn't want a divorce. He prefers his dishes piping hot, and Rita was just a warmed over meal. But you'd think that in the few brief days that he allotted his wife in Hollywood—not more than a week—that he would play ball, at least try to please her.

But the quiet life Rita loves is an impossible dream for Aly. After three days he was guest of honor at the Charles Vidor party, without Rita. She was invited too, but obstinately refused to accompany him. And she stayed home when Cole Porter threw a whingding on the fourth night. On the fifth day, Aly flew to the Del Mar racetrack without her. And on the sixth he drove to Long Beach to visit a former friend—feminine gender.

So it's obvious that Rita was in love with her Prince, and you can see how much she wanted the marriage to work when she took off for his home in Paris. He was supposed to meet her boat at Cherbourg, but he wasn't there when she arrived. He was somewhere in the South of France having a barrel of fun. She proceeded to the Paris house alone. A few days later he leisurely turned up and made a big thing of the reunion, calling in all the photographers to witness the loving poses "with my wife."

I WAS critical of Rita when she didn't take their daughter to Europe to be with her father. Now I see why. It's one thing for Rita to take a chance with Aly; but until she was certain in her own mind it could work out, she wouldn't drag a couple of kids back and forth across the Atlantic in winter. She did that once, and had to leave them in France while she flew to Africa with her lord, who could never be her master.

That's another thing Rita will never fathom. How can Aly don a mantle of piety with the ease of pressing a button, when all he lives for in Europe is fun, Fun, FUN? So, in faraway Africa, she accused him of hypocrisy. She could be right, although an intimate of Aly's tells me he had a lunch date with Aly at the Ritz not long ago, but Aly cancelled at the last hour, explaining he had to fly to London to see the Swedish Ambassador. When asked "Why?" he replied, "I'm trying to get Swedish steel for my followers in Africa."

Even steel loses its strength when you put it through fire. And even if Rita's flame for Aly ever glows again, which could happen but I doubt it, it'll be a flicker, not a blaze. As I told you previously, Rita can never revolutionize her outlook to where she could live on champagne for breakfast—for Aly, water is something you wash in only—and heartbreak for supper. And that brings us to the women in his life.

This last time, even while he was telephoning Rita with the news he was on his way to her in Hollywood, he was also writing letters to Yvonne De Carlo making a date for a whirling weekend in New York! And while supposedly shattered with grief when Rita took off, without notice, to America, while he was hymn-singing in Nairobi, he drowned his disappointment in the fascinating company of pert Greek star Irene Pappas. He even found time between tears to introduce her to Mack Sennett, because she thought he was still a big wheel in the picture business and could bring her to Hollywood.

Those Katharine Dunham rumors just about the time Rita was expecting their baby? His Deauville dates with Joan Fontaine? They might have meant something, they probably meant nothing. Let us never forget that in Moslem tradition a woman counts for nothing except to bear sons for the glory of Allah. You can bet that Rita will rear Yasmin for the glory of the little girl's happiness whatever the religion. She's a good mother in spite of her frenzied and pathetic non-stop search for the perfect romance, which has in the past taken her away from her children very frequently when she'd rather be with them.

WHEN Glenn Ford, who has worked so much with Rita, talks about her, which he only rarely does, there's a great sympathy and a touch of tragedy in his voice. He seems apprehensive for her happiness. And actually, with the shedding of her once Prince Charming, what does the future promise for Rita?

She won't lack money—although she asked none for herself from Aly. She's expected to collect at least half-a-million dollars from her last two pictures—Affair In Trinidad, and Salome—capital gains too—for her own Beckwith Corporation. And I don't see how she can miss with Miss Sadie Thompson, the Somerset Maugham play, Rain, that has brought fame and acclaim to everyone who plays the leading lady.

Rita isn't careful or particularly clever with money. She lives quietly, doesn't spend money on parties or pretties, and she can stash enough away to retire one day on her own terms.

Money could never spell happiness for Rita. I'm not sure anything can. But a reasonable facsimile will have to look like a Man. She'll fall in love again—and again and again. The woods are full of men willing to leap on the Hayworth love wagon. Publicity seekers like Bob Savage, who trumpeted about some kisses and called a columnist with the world-shaking news that he was off to Spain to marry her—and she didn't know who he was from Hades.

Rita, the girl without formal education, has an innate instinct for the right thing to do. She's always a lady when she busts up with her beaux, even when she marries them—and except for explaining that she couldn't live with a genius—Orson Wells—invariably says, "No comment," before and after the romance of the moment.

She said, "No comment," when asked if she planned to marry Spanish Count José María Villa-Padierna when she divorces Aly. Although she was seen everywhere with the Count in Madrid when she left Aly's mansion in Paris—the Spaniard's a horse breeder, too, and I'll bet she won't play second fiddle to the nags again. (Rita's unpredictable so I won't bet too much!)

Casting a cold eye over the Hollywood product, your favorite guess is as good as mine. Dick Greene was a favorite when she left. But she might be married to someone else when you read this. She raised her sights when she raised her hairline, 15, 16 years ago. Now Rita wants to revert to the kind of life that was possible when she answered to Marguerite Cansino. Cinderella is tired. The glass shoe pinched. We can only hope her fairy godmother has another trick up her wand. P. S. It's pumpkins to Princes the old gal has.

(Continued from page 46) to everybody but himself. Then he leaned back and said, "That's the longest speech in my life. Let me out of here!"

"Me, too," Mr. Delacorte agreed. So they went back to the party which shifted suddenly into high gear as the doors opened wide to admit the year's greatest gathering of stars.

It's almost impossible to report all the excitement that goes on at a party like this one. Who escorts whom and who goes home with the one that didn't bring 'em.

For instance there was the case of Lana Turner and her erstwhile gentleman friend, Fernando Lamas. Lana, who won the All-Time Ten-Year Popularity Award, a handful of votes ahead of Betty Grable, was taken with a sudden attack of flu the day before the party and couldn't attend. This on the heels of a mild adventure in Palm Springs, during which Lana and Ava Gardner had a spat with Frank Sinatra over nobody knows what. Meantime, the news was out that Lana and Fernando were no longer making such beautiful music together, and everyone wondered who the Metro Latin Lover would escort to the party.

Fernando didn't let romance down. He showed up with Arlene Dahl, recently detached from Lex Barker. Arlene's beauty was at its cameo-like perfection and those who knew Lana said that Fernando couldn't have brought anyone who would make Lana more jealous. (That's what they said. We're not saying, nor is Lana.)

You never can tell what's going to be the big scoop at a party. In Hollywood, if some of the guests come with the people they are supposed to, that's news. For example, Diana Lynn and her architect husband, if you believe some columns, are not getting along too well with their reconciliation. But at the MODERN SCREEN party they looked like they had just discovered each other yesterday, and it wasn't acting.

But what really started the whispering was the sudden appearance of Mr. and Mrs. Dale Robertson. This was shortly on the heels of the announcement that they had separated. No one expected that they'd show up together. They did, though, and every time an unattached male whispered to another, "Who's that luscious doll," he got the answer, "That's Mrs. Dale Robertson—better try to date somebody else!"

It seems that Mr. Robertson is not a man to be fooled with. He had a wonderful time at the party, particularly when he cornered Chuck Saxon, the editor, and told him right out in a public corner that he was sore about something or other. When they were through with their brief argument, Chuck was heard to exclaim, "I got to hand it to that guy. I never knew an actor who had courage to tell an editor off in person. But (P. S.) that doesn't mean that I agree with him."

FUNNY about Hollywood parties. It takes more than a small fight, verbal or otherwise, to make one a success, and all hands agreed that this, indeed, was the "party that lasts all year," for the reporters and photographers had a field day from the time Louella Parsons showed up, escorted by the distinguished song writer, Jimmy McHugh, until Marilyn Monroe made a climactic solo entrance, causing all males present to gravitate across the room until it looked top-heavy. Then Jane Russell came in the opposite door, and balance was somewhat restored.

Yup, there's a fever about a successful party. There were a lot of gate-crashers, including Johnnie Ray, who for some reason or other never received an invitation. But he was there, laughing, not crying.

"You know what I think, Mr. Delacorte?" Bob Mitchum asked, answering the question himself. "I think you ought to sell tickets to this party every year for producers who are searching for new talent." He arched a famous eyebrow at an unknown blonde who practically swooned in her tracks. "There are enough stars of tomorrow here to cast every picture for the next two years."

Mr. Mitchum never said it better, and he's said many a mouthful in his time, for among those present were Karen Sharpe, the TV lovely who shares MODERN SCREEN Golden Key honors with the darkly beautiful Ursula (RKO) Thiess, Paramount's Joan Taylor, Red Skelton's exciting blonde comedy sparring partner, Lucy Knoch, Anne Francis and other MS discoveries.

When guests could take their eyes off such enticing creatures as Piper Laurie and the buxom Denise Darcel, they chorused one of the most repeated questions of the evening, namely, "Who is that striking brunette in the gingham dress—the one with the eyes?"

Naturally it was obvious that all the girls at the party had eyes, but this child was something else again. She wasn't and isn't more than 19 years old. And the hit she made at the party was big enough, although a mere atom compared to a hydrogen explosion that followed later that same night when she took the spotlight at Mocambo and sang her way into a big time Paramount contract. The girl's name is Joanne Gilbert. She's the daughter of famous song writer, Ray Gilbert, and what she has in voice and figure is welcome to movie-goers as well as Paramount stockholders. If you don't believe it, wait until you see her in the big musical, Away We Go, in which she is co-starred (in her very first picture, yet) with Donald O'Connor.

On the male side, there were the discoveries of the last couple of years—the darkly handsome Tony Dexter, Bob Wagner, who arrived stag to claim his cup because Debbie Reynolds had to work that night, Ricardo Montalban, Bob Stack, Ken Tobey, Dick Anderson and Gene Nelson.

And then (draw a long breath, gals), there was that six-foot, four-inch male who is being groomed to take John Wayne's place at Republic, now that John has gone free lance. It just happens that his name is John, too. John Russell. And you can get a load of him, even if you weren't at the party, in Fair Wind To Java.

YOU'VE probably pondered on the problems of being a movie star. Consider the problem of being a reporter and trying to tell about a gala party in which almost all of the famous guests should be in the first paragraph of your story. Particularly when you have personal favorites, such as Marge and Gower Champion, who won the award for being 1952's Co-starring Discoveries. There are no greater people than these, nor for that matter than Paul Douglas and his wife, Jan Sterling.

We came upon Jan and Paul as they were telling Louella Parsons and George Delacorte about the plans for their second trip to Korea (which has just taken place.) They were about to take off by plane with Carleton Carpenter, Barbara Ruick, Peggy King, Rory Calhoun and a host of others to make the G.I. Christmas a little happier.

If you don't think actors are rugged, genuine people, try looking Paul Douglas in the eye sometime. Or risk a handshake with Buddy Baer.

That's if you like actors. We happen to like the endless gang who were at the party. Like David Wayne, who spills over with talent. Like Charlton Heston, who is a cinch to land on the Ten Most Popular list in 1953. (Our authority: the editors' wives.) Like the cowboy contingent, long popular Johnny Mack Brown and Rex Allen. Like Pete Lawford and John Agar. Now there's a MODERN SCREEN favorite, just beginning to get his big breaks so long deserved. John's lovely wife told us that his new picture for RKO is going to be My Dad, J. R., Edward Arnold's son.

"This joint—beg pardon—this place—is like Grand Central Station," Academy Award winner Celeste Holm exclaimed. "Every time I come to a MODERN SCREEN party I don't believe it—there are so many new stars. I figure a girl's got to keep busy to keep working." Her modesty is becoming but not necessary, for Celeste, after wowing them on Broadway and in TV for a year, is back to make competition even tougher in Hollywood.

Speaking of competition, two stars really scored in the fashion and beauty department. There was our particular pet, Ann Blyth, who arrived with one arm linked to new acting discovery, Palmer Lee, who could be a new romance. The other arm carried her magnificent new mink cape, and her delightful face was framed in a hat that just wouldn't stop. (Hedda Hopper will pay her plenty for that chapeau when Ann is through with it.) Then, Jeanne Crain, in a white beaded dress with a feathered picture hat. She stopped the party cold for at least a minute and a half, and caused Don Taylor to take his eyes away from the ever-charming Mrs. T. long enough to exclaim, "I don't believe it!" (If we misquote you, Don, see you next year and we'll straighten it out.)

So the band played on, flowing like champagne, right up to the several wonderful climaxes of the evening, one of which occurred when Janet Leigh and Tony Curtis, both among the Ten Most Popular Favorites of the year, showed up to accept the All-Time Comedy Favorites Award for Dean Martin and Jerry Lewis, who were keeping the public hysterical on a personal appearance tour.

"Aha!" Janet exclaimed into the radio microphone, "this is a great opportunity. We can lose those guys right now."

"Sure thing," Tony agreed. "This is as good a time as any to grab a few minutes to tell the world about our co-starring picture, Houdini." But they didn't do that. Instead, they said so many good things about America's favorite idiots that there isn't room to print them here. (And speaking of idiots, Tony was limping from an accident received on the set. Some columnist reported that Janet had kicked him under the table. No truth to this, though.)

Well, that's rumor for you. Rumor usually starts with beautiful women. Perhaps that's why, because Marilyn appeared alone at the party, people got the idea that she and Joe DiMaggio had busted up. The truth was that Joe wasn't ready yet to make his first big public splash with Marilyn.

Marilyn, however, made plenty of splash on her own. When she was interviewed on the air by Jim McCulla, she matched him quip for quip as she accepted her Most Popular New Star Award. And because a party has to end somewhere, we conclude this report with Jim asking Marilyn, "Do gentlemen prefer blondes?"

Marilyn staggered the commentator with her famous look and replied, lazily, "Gosh, Jim, I HOPE SO!"

D is for daddy

(Continued from page 56) they stare glassy-eyed at the TV. But at other times, in the grip of the enthusiasm that energizes all new home owners, they stalk about their property and marvel at their accomplishments and fall in love with the place all over again. It is then that they stand at the huge window—that is two glass walls of the living room—and look down at the million lights of the city far beneath, and with arms about one another grin at their handiwork and frustrations alike and contemplate happily the certain joys of the future there on their mountain top.

There is no doorbell. Attention is gained by knocking the heavy front door. Michael Wilding greeted me dressed in a pair of faded blue jeans, moccasins and a casual sport shirt. He ushered me to the lone sofa and handed me a tall cool glass of iced tea. Elizabeth Taylor Wilding came in a moment later and she was a sight to behold. I have no talent for describing fashions, but she wore a pair of clinging corduroy trousers and a short jacket of the same material, trimmed and lined with checkered satin. She carried herself with the regal poise of all young mothers. Pregnancy has not altered her beauty. Her full mouth was as mobile as ever and as quick to smile. Her huge violet eyes were as bright, her exquisite complexion as fair as when I had seen her last. She wore her hair cut like an urchin, with wispy strands caressing her forehead and the back of her neck. As she strutted about the room she looked like an expensive doll that might be seen in a Fifth Avenue shop window.

The purpose of the call was, of course, to talk about the coming baby, but, as we sat there talking, it suddenly developed into a briefing session. I observed that to Michael Wilding the birth of his child was an event bristling with possibilities of disaster. Not tragedy, but minor disaster that added up could muddle things intolerably.

THERE is an old joke, still cackled over in country territory, that goes something like this: A gentleman, calling on a lady who lived in a fourth floor apartment, melted a few too many ice cubes. As he was leaving, he mistook a pair of French doors for the main entrance—and seconds later was picking himself off the sidewalk below. There he encountered an acquaintance who confessed that he, too, was about to call on the same young lady. "Then I am in a position to give you some advice," said the near-casualty. "When you leave, watch that first step. It's a Lulu!"

Someone, somewhere at sometime must have convinced Michael Wilding that the first step in the raising of a family is a Lulu, for he approaches the date with extreme anxiety. As a matter of fact, he prepares for it very much in the manner of the classic caricature of a moving picture father-to-be. He doesn't actually spoon-feed Elizabeth or help her in and out of chairs, but he views her every unexpected move with alarm. And her oft-said, "Now really, Michael, I'm all right!" is taken with a grain of salt.

It has been a smug practice for ages for other people to smile slyly at a man's concern at the time of birth. He has been depicted in cartoons and on film trembling like a thief at a convention of detectives. He has been lampooned as a dolt who, in time of stress, pulls his trousers on over his pajamas and races to the hospital alone, unaware that his wife is still casually packing at home. He has been pictured as a fool with an active passion for pulling on the lapels of obstetrical physicians while he pleads for assurance that the little lady is going to pull through. The mildest canard is that he is a nimble idiot who can smoke an entire package of cigarettes at one time in the narrow area of that comedy institution, the Fathers' Room.

Well, none of these caricatures will fit Michael Wilding on The Day. He has seen to all eventualities. Not like a floundering simpleton, but like a man quite aware of what can happen if even the smallest detail is left to chance.

There is a hazardous distance of some ten miles between the Wilding home and the hospital in Santa Monica where the child is to be born. It has been thoroughly reconnoitered. Trial runs have been made in both the Wilding cars, Elizabeth's Cadillac and Michael's Jaguar. At the present time Elizabeth makes it more quickly and with less effort in her car.

According to the plan I listened to, at the first sign of a suspect pang, the obstetrician—who has been requested to keep in touch during the last month—will be calmly called and the nature, extent and area of the discomfort will be described to him in a matter-of-fact tone. No hysteria. If, as is to be expected, the doctor considers it nothing more than a bit of dinner salmon, the Wildings will return to bed and to sleep.

Upon the occasion of the real thing—and the Wildings plan to trust to the obstetrician's instincts on this—there will be an orderly but speedy preparation for departure. A bag, containing the needs of the mother in the hospital, will, of course, be packed and placed near the front door well in advance of The Day. Michael and Elizabeth figure it will attract no more attention than an occasional "What's that?" There will be no getting into the wrong things. Although Michael has never been in a fire house, his clothing will be arranged so that he can slip into his most important garments with no waste of time or energy—much like a fire-fighter, who can leap from a sound sleep in his shorts to a fully-dressed thud at the bottom of a brass pole in 60 seconds.

ALTHOUGH completely inexperienced in the business of fatherhood, Michael Wilding is, of course, fully aware that a long-legged bird is not going to flap onto his chimney some night and drop his heir into his waiting arms. He knows that getting his wife to the proper place of arrival is his responsibility, and that transportation over that hazardous ten miles must be arranged with the closest attention to detail. Altogether too many children mix their first angry cry with the unmusical click of a taxi meter; and policemen are delivering as many babies in some localities as doctors.

The Beverly Hills Police Department has been alerted and has agreed to provide an escort, complete with sirens to terrify all non-expecting motorists out of the way, to the hospital. With this assistance Michael figures he can get Elizabeth into the maternity quarters almost as fast as if he lived next door. The method of summoning the coppers will probably have to be by telephone, although there is the hazard there of wrong numbers, fingers stuck in dials and operators who, in emergencies, can't speak English. A flare might do the trick, but then the men on the desk watch at the Beverly Hills Police station would be required to keep their eyes peeled to the north sky all during the month of January. Too risky.

Elizabeth made a suggestion during the briefing that they drive sanely down the mountain and pick up the escort at the Beverly Hills Hotel. This may be adopted.

Another thing that Michael Wilding is cognizant of is that babies born in hospitals sometimes get mixed up. He remembers reading somewhere that it happened right in Los Angeles about 1936. "A man takes an awful chance," he said. "They put a lot of them in back of that glassed-in pen in little cribs, and the Lord knows how they keep track of who they belong to. No sense in taking a chance on that, is there?"

In order to avoid this possibility, the Wildings have already engaged two rooms at the hospital with a door between, so that either Michael or Elizabeth can keep an eye on the tot from the time it is delivered until they take it home. He has been assured by his wife's doctor, the hospital staff and most of his friends that the babies are footprinted immediately after birth, tagged with identification beads and never out of the sight of a wary nurse until they have been settled in their own marked crib. But he doesn't trust the system. And he and Elizabeth both excuse the other room and the special nurses required on the grounds that in this way they will be able to see their first born at any time, and that Michael will not have to observe regular visiting hours and press his nose against a pane of glass to get a peek at his offspring.

BEYOND ushering Elizabeth through the hospital doors and into a room where she will be in competent hands, Michael has no definite plans. He feels that when this has been done his duties as a pre-father will have been discharged. His only obligation from that point forward will be to see that the doctor is kept awake and aware of the importance of the occasion, and that the nurses remember they are disciples of Florence Nightingale and spare Elizabeth all possible discomfort.

No one has had the heart, apparently, to tell him about the hours of waiting. He has not been briefed on the Fathers' Room. Well, having been there, I can tell him about that.

When Elizabeth has been taken beyond the one-way door that leads to the alien area of the maternity ward—a place which no male without an MD tacked on his name may enter—his usefulness in the matter at hand will have ended. He will be treated like an old lover, abandoned and forgotten. He will be ignored by all members of the hospital staff, who will brush past him in the halls as though he didn't exist.

After a few hours of pacing a rubber-tiled floor like a wraith, he will be drawn, as though by a magnet, to the Fathers' Room. Here he will find his own kind, wan, skeptical, harried men to whom the sound of each footfall is the tread of approaching doom. Among these poor creatures, who generally assemble in coveys of half-a-dozen or so, he will find a cross-section of life, although they are gauged differently than men on the "outside." There will be silent, pale-faced men, crying men, fainting men and occasionally stony-faced, unconcerned men. These latter are known in the Fathers' Room vernacular as "repeaters."

Normal social contact is never seen in the Fathers' Room. A man will shout a vital question at another—and then turn away and be deep in another dismal dream before the answer is given. A continual contest is in progress. "Eighteen hours!" one will cry in triumph. "I've been here 36!" another will chortle in pitiful victory. Watches are consulted every few minutes. And each time anything white passes the door, there are exclamations of "Nurse! . . . Nurse! . . . Doctor! . . . Orderly! . . . Nurse! . . . Doctor! . . ." etc. But no one on the other side ever pays any attention.

Whenever the activities in the Fathers' Room die down and the waiting occupants, faces hidden in clouds of tobacco smoke, settle down and it looks as though the men might get some rest, a coldy-officious nurse appears in the doorway. "Mr Abernathy?" she asks. When Abernathy staggers to his feet, she says matter-of-factly, "Your wife has just given birth to a fine baby boy (girl) and they're both doing well." When Abernathy has been revived and removed the panic settles on the room again until the next announcement is made.

Michael Wilding has made all the proper preparations, but no man can steel himself for the ordeal of waiting, nor plan his activities during the fretful last hours of his wife's confinement.

THE best calculations at the moment place the time of the birth of Elizabeth Taylor Wilding's baby in January, but Nature, that shifty one, has been known to cross up even fathers and magazine writers, so there is a possibility that when this piece is read the child will have been born, and already happily at home in its large, canary-colored room, with lots of no-draft windows. It will sleep in a crib fit for a prince or princess and spend its waking hours absorbing the warmth and the love and the fun that fills the Wilding home. There will be nothing but the best in the way of accoutrements, for although an infant's wants are few, they require creature comforts like the rest of us—and respond with even tempers and good health to the care they are given.

There is already quite a stock of necessities about, such as diapers and small gowns and rattles. Some of them were brought home by Michael who, along with Geary Steffen, was given a shower by his friend Spike Jones some time ago. The presents were to be gags but they included, as well as diapers galore, a high chair and other bits of child furniture. Michael was quite proud of his take that night when Elizabeth came to pick him up, as did the other wives of the husbands attending. He glowed like a man who had won a raffle.

Over in a corner of Michael and Elizabeth's room there is a growing stack of books which give advice on the care and growth of babies. They are rather dog-eared already, and the reading of them has resulted in some really important discussions between the parents.

"Now you take walking," said Michael one night. "That's a bit of a problem, isn't it?"

"All babies do it eventually," said Liz. "I suppose you're right," said Michael turning a page.

There is nothing facetious in all these things written here. It is a dead serious time in a father's life. A man doesn't have a baby every day—and Michael Wilding, for all his wit and humor, for all his inexperienced preparations, is a man who takes serious things seriously. If his plotting seems strange to you, it is just because, like the rest of us, you find comedy in fatherhood and a joke in such situations because you already know—and he doesn't—that everything is going to be all right.

NEXT year will tell the tale. I'd like to drive up that mountain again and get a look at the three of them. Maybe the house will be finished by then. They'll be standing at dusk before the big glass window. The beautiful mother, the handsome father, and the son—or daughter—looking down upon the city as the lights blink on and fill the child's eyes with magic. The three of them, holding hands together—the terror of the birth of the first child well behind them—surrounded by the warmth that is the word Family. Yes, I'd like to ride up there and see that.

"Not five like this, we didn't," he glowered at her. "So eat that steak, drink that orange juice and glucose, and as soon as it's all down you lie down and get some rest, or . . ."

Betty did as she was told.

Further down the street, in a pub near the Palladium, two casually tweeded gentlemen of the press decided to have another pint of bitter each, and have another to it.

"Whatever can we say, old man?" asked one deadline sprinter of the other.

"That she was wonderful, of course."

"Can't say that, it's meaningless. We've said it about 'Star Turns' before. They were wonderful, but Betty Hutton is superb."

"Superb is no good; sounds as if we were reviewing Dame Sybil Thorndyke." "But what can we write? She thrilled me, you know, but no one will ever believe that we actually mean to say 'thrilling.'" One must see Miss Hutton's performance to believe that a variety turn can be so emotional an experience."

The first newsmen reluctantly put down his mug. "Well, I've got to hop it back to the office. I shall just have to give the young lady one of our ratings. Our top is three stars, so I'll give her four. But it still won't tell people how wonderful, terrific, superb and thrilling she was tonight."

That's pretty strong talk for a reserved Britisher, but it was pretty strong stuff that brought it on, for they'd just witnessed a show that went like this:

After more than an hour of singing sweet and hot, dancing straight and for laughs, Betty took to her trapeze and moved once and for all that it's all true about her having done her own high flying for The Greatest Show On Earth. This part was her finale, an exhibition that literally took the curl out of her hair, and figuratively that of everyone who saw it.

The audience had been extremely well impressed by the typical Hutton antics that had gone on before; they'd had their money's worth, and were more than satisfied as Betty swung, looped, and hung upside down and inside out over their heads. Their palms were ready to tear the house down with applause, when Betty suddenly plunged down, and with a snap that looked like a bone-cracker, was stopped from falling into their midst by a small rope around her ankle.

The audience gasped with horror. Not believing that such a famous star would take unnecessary risks to top an untopable show, they believed they were eyewitnesses to a terrible accident. Then she smiled, and slipped down to the stage.

They exploded with thunderous cheers. Betty gulped for air, almost choking on her involuntary sobs as she bowed and threw kisses. Only "God Save The Queen" quieted the scene. Then with the curtain down, hiding her from view, Betty Hutton walked rigidly offstage, her knees locked with every step until the tension in her muscles relaxed.

SMALL wonder that the press exploded the next morning with quotes like: "What a display of courage!" "Miss Hutton has put an end to 'best since Danny Kaye.'" A third read, "She's a nice girl, clean, and wholesome. Definitely no red hot mama. A real darling!"

Everyone agreed that the human jet was much improved over her 1948 appearance. She was a sensation then, if one happened to like "Bang, Boom and Bounce," but this time, with her fresh poise and assurance, it's a different story. All London has raised its derby to a trouper with talent, high gloss of professionalism, guts, pathos, humor and beauty.

What this means is that Betty, by succeeding in vaudeville, which she considers the prime barometer of show business, has finally won her spurs. From now on she is a star in its fullest meaning. Before the big leap, neither she nor Charlie O'Curran were sure of what would happen, but they had the courage to make a try.

If you remember, the stakes were for all or nothing. Happily the decision is in, and all on their side. They won hands down.

"It wasn't so hard with Genius at my side," says the blonde, hugging her groom.

There's no need now to worry about losing the one thing in the world she really owned, her house. No need for Charlie to wonder if he did right in giving up his contract at Paramount. No sir. No need to worry about anything but their health.

This last point is, however, one to consider seriously. Having had one breakdown since her opening, it is no wonder that Charlie watches Betty like a combination doctor, coach, and mother hen.

They arrived in England scarcely two months after her last throat operation, and she was not, needless to say, at her very strongest. She actually looked a bit peaked, but since time is money now that they're free-lancers, they had to get the show on the road. And a tough, exciting, demanding show it is.

Even a completely healthy girl might understandably feel dizzy from such physical effort, so it was almost to be expected that one so recently under the surgeon's knife would reel and sway and nearly fall.

This is exactly what happened one performance. Seeing all was not as it should have been, Betty's mother screamed. The crowd, knowing then about the stunt fall, thought it was part of the act, and took it as such until Betty was helped down and stepped forward to apologize in a weak little voice.

The doctor called it flu and ordered her to bed where she stayed for only one day. She'd missed the first performance of her life and she didn't like it. Frankie Laine, who had bought tickets to see her, filled in for her instead.

"He was swell, and I'm grateful to him, but the people expect to see me, don't they," she croaked from her bed. So back she went, still pretty wobbly. "And they're going to see it all."

In addition to orders from her doctor, pleadings from her husband, her mother and even her manager, she received 50 telegrams, all to the same effect. "Cut the trapeze. It isn't worth the risk," they said. As the head of an official delegation, the president of her Paddington fan club went around and told her the show was good enough; and that the members did not want to lose their star, so please stick to singing and dancing. Betty's answer was typically Hutton. "Well, that's very sweet, and I appreciate it. But I'm not promisin' anything except that I'm rarin' to go."

THE day she returned to the act, no one, possibly not even Betty herself, knew what she intended doing about the finale. It was a real-life enactment of the crucial scene from any number of the pictures she's made. In her own direct way she stepped to the edge of the blazing stage.

"I have an apology to make to you people," she said, peering out into the blackness. "I haven't been feelin' so hot. I might have to take a flyin' run into the wings . . . and if that happens I hope you will forgive me. I want to give you a great show, but I might make mistakes. So . . . Well, bear with me, will you?"

And then, making the atom bomb look like the convalescent, she proceeded to give them the best show yet. At one point, she put her foot through the piano, and sure enough, finished with the trapeze.

A new set of reviews blossomed next day. Her "return" was greeted with the enthusiasm usually reserved for the Royal Navy after an especially difficult bout with the enemy. Betty and her trapeze had become nearly as important as the changing of the guards.

So much had her courage impressed the British that when ex-Prime Minister Clement Atlee pulled an unusually daring political feat a few days later, the headlines referred to it as "A Betty Hutton." A new expression for something brave and risky has passed into the Queen's English.

Two things favored a reception warmer than her last. Firstly, Londoners, no matter how eager for a star's visit, are cautious the first time. Not only that—in 1948 Betty was a pretty strange pill for them to swallow. "An acquired taste, like mushrooms," someone had said then. She impressed them, but she failed to touch their hearts as had, for instance, Danny Kaye.

But this year, she didn't just "come" to London. She "came back" . . . a vast difference. Even better, she was greatly subdued and infinitely more charming and appealing. Also there is that love light in her eyes, and he who says an Englishman can't appreciate that sort of thing as well as any Latin just doesn't know England.

Soon after their fabulous opening the O'Curran's invited a few people up to celebrate. Someone asked Charlie if he found living with a girl who daily breaks through the sound barrier more than somewhat nervewracking.

"Oh no, 'cause when I tell her to pipe down, she pipes down!" He pounded the arm of the chair he was sitting in, with his bride on his lap. "No, sir. Life with the Lambchop isn't all slam, bang, scream, and yell. The operation gave me a spell of peace. Only thing is that now she can holler twice as effectively."

Betty nodded, then added, "But I won't unless absolutely necessary. We must conserve our professional resources, so you do the hollering for me." She squeezed his arm and snuggled deeper into his lap. "You know, this guy is awfully active. I can hardly keep up with him." Her eyes drooped sleepily and Charlie had to prop her to her feet so she could say good night like a little lady.

Mr. O'Curran rates high with Lindsay and Candice, too. At least such would be the case judging by what they said to their father recently when he asked if they loved him. "Yes, Daddy, we love you; but we love Charlie, too."

BETTY was supposed to have been pretty bossy in her previous marriage. She is supposed to have refused to let Ted Briskin have even a small part of the say that Charlie gets. A friend explains it this way: "Briskin wasn't the least interested in show business. He just wanted to boss, with no special aim in view. So rather than let him get everything hopelessly balled up, Betty put her foot down in the beginning. She'll tell you that it means everything to her to be able to have someone constantly around with Overheard in the Mocambo powder room: "How do I know she writes her own fan mail? Didja' ever notice the spelling?"

Mike Connolly

whom she can talk show business. She loves it and she has to have a husband who loves it, too."

Betty agrees very willingly with this diagnosis. "Ted was a nice guy, all right, but he made cameras, and since I don't know anything about cameras we used to be pretty stuck for conversation."

So it wasn't true that Betty had to run things for the sake of being boss. Nor is it true that love is currently blinding her reason. Unless all this present success is only a happy blunder.

The new Mrs. O.C. had long talked up Charlie's abilities as a producer, but no one in Hollywood would take her very seriously, if at all. When she told Paramount she'd stay with them only if they made him a full director, they thought him so inadequate they decided to lose her rather than risk him. But now, merely on the basis of the team's first ventures, even a Paramount executive has to admit that O'Curran has what it takes.

Right after New York handed them its favorable verdict Betty screamed to all the world, "What'd I tell you? My man! My boss!" From her point of view, the entire credit is due him, that is, unless someone else says so. Then maybe a tiny touch of ham in her shows with a pink flush around the hairline and a small pucker between the brows.

Strictly from a production point of view, the slide-rule perfect show is his all right. For example, there is one place in it where Betty uses black face. Burnt cork takes a long time to apply, and a longer time to remove. Since she has to make seven costume changes in full view of the audience, a lesser idea man would have decided to sacrifice the number. But not our Charles. He up and invented a chocolate colored gelatine slide and his wife is lighted into black face and out of it with the flick of a switch.

Telling of their courtship Betty inadvertently admits that solid respect is at the base of her love for her husband; and in interrupting the telling, he reveals the same thing lies at the bottom of his love for her.

"Yeah," she chuckles, "I guess you could call me smug. Look what I got. He's not higher up than me, but he weighs 168, and that's not petite. Another thing, he's not prepared to take a walk, and he'll never take second billing."

She was harking back to her famous remark made in the hopeless despair of ever finding a man who could handle her, cope with her, love her, and look down on her a little.

"I never would have guessed he was for me when I first met him on the set. For a week or so I just sort of noticed him around, and then after a routine I casually asked, 'How'm I doin'?' 'Pretty bad, dreamboat,' he said. Now, nobody jokes with me when I'm concentratin' on a picture. So I went straight to the bosses and said, 'Fire this dance director, and fire him quick!' They calmed me down and I shut up for a while.

"Then a few weeks later, something was wrong with one of my exits, and he kept buttin' in, sayin', 'Miss Hutton, if you would just try startin' off with your right foot.' I hated him deeply, and I kept bawlin' him out with words you can't print, and I guess I tried that exit a hundred times. Then I accidentally started off with the right foot, like he said, and it clicked!"

"After which," injects O'Curran, "Betty stepped forward in front of about 200 people on the lot and said, 'Folks, O'Curran has been right since nine this morning, and I want to apologize to him and to you.' Whereupon, as you will understand, I realized she was 100% woman, and I loved her very much."

That's how they started dating.

"He would try to smooch in the car," she recalls with a giggle, "and I would say, 'Please, Mr. O'Curran, please. Our relationship is strictly business, and in any case, I insist you get rid of that mustache!'" (O'Curran is still sporting the mustache.) "So," she goes on, "I went to Korea and missed him something awful. There were a lot of guys out there. Handsome guys with medals even, and I asked myself what O'Curran had that was so special and then it hit me. O'Curran was the only man with sex appeal who could make me laugh. They just didn't come together before, and then I knew it didn't make so much difference if I didn't have a million bucks in the bank after all. Which is a thought that never entered my head before. So I came home and proposed to him."

"And I turned her down," her groom continues. "The poor girl wasn't at all well, and I thought she was delirious."

"He never did accept me, I had to kidnap him," says Mrs. O'Curran, wearing her smug pirate look. "First I called up my secretary and told her to get two tickets to Nevada. We were having dinner at Lucy's across from the studio. Well, she called back and said there weren't any tickets that night for anywhere in Nevada. So I told her to charter a plane, and off we went and got married."

"Amen," says Charlie, looking like a mighty happy kidnap victim.

SOMEWHERE about that time the steady change, or steady progress of Betty's personality began. It came to full flower with the overwhelming confirmation of the rightness of the marriage, her change, their flight from previous commitments the opening night at the Palladium. Starting when she made her decision about Charlie out there in Korea, she has grown daily greater as a woman, and as a performer. This leads only to the conclusion that O'Curran is the best thing that has ever happened to Hutton.

Most of the changes in her life are directly or indirectly due to him. While she had long felt the studio was increasingly dictatorial, and didn't know what to do about it, he gave her the courage and moral support to break away, and something to fall back on if she failed. Neither claims ownership of the notion to cut the tie, but they say they came to the conclusion together, and it suddenly seemed so ridiculously simple. Just up and leave. They still wonder why it hadn't occurred to them before.

Those who have loved Betty Hutton for years needn't worry, though. She hasn't really changed, but rather seems to have grown to her best advantage. It was all there before, it's just been developed. For instance, Betty has always had excellent clothes sense, but she didn't stand still long enough for anyone to notice. Now they do. London particularly has noted with approval Betty's good tweed suits worn with simple accessories for morning appearances; her dignified but beautiful afternoon clothes; and the downright gracious evening costumes she wears so charmingly. She launched a fad there for fake pearls all over everything, and quite in spite of herself has become a rival with Princess Margaret for pace-setting hats. A London lady must now choose between a head-hugging Princess hat, or an about-to-fall-off Betty sort of thing.

Although years of mistreating her voice made what she calls "an operation for corns on the vocal chords" necessary, it may well have been Charlie's common sense that led her to take the first singing lessons in her life. Or it may have been a good scare too.

"Okay, my voice wasn't right for the Met," she smiles, "but it was my bread and butter, and for a while after the operation there wasn't any voice at all. I don't mind tellin' you I was scared. People thought I was savin' it, but I tell you that for a few days it didn't even exist. Then it started to come back, like a little baby's at first, but it was there. I was so grateful I got down on my knees, and promised to take care of it always."

In typical Hutton fashion she had been dramatizing every phase of the telling, down to the Jolson finish. Then brightly, she added her epilogue, "It's a better voice, already. I can sing a little higher and a little lower . . . sorta sexier."

"She means she used to be a whisky tenor, and now she's a pink gin soprano," laughed her husband.

THAT'S how things looked in London. And they kept on looking rosy. They took off for a "provincial tour," Betty bundled up in a pair of pink fur slippers Charlie had bought her for a present. "Pink for a girl and fur because it's going to be cold."

When last heard from her press agent reported something like this:

"The tour is wonderful. They're as big a success out of town as here in London. Her health is better every day. Work is just a tonic to her. The marriage is perfect, a sock hit. After the tour they'll head for America and the biggest Hutton-O'Curran production . . . the baby. Betty's scheduled to do the Sophie Tucker story, but figures she can make it come out fine. . . . She has to be padded to play Sophie in the last scenes anyway. . . ."

Which should answer once and for all the question of marriage versus career. At least for Betty Hutton O'Curran, they're practically one and the very same thing.

Best Wishes,

"I puzzle me," says Ava Gardner.

"I'm one of those people I just can't understand," she explains, in this, the tenth of MODERN SCREEN's series on the art of living, written by Hollywood's most popular stars.

Take my word for it

by AVA GARDNER, star columnist for February

There's more to life than being waited on

People kid me about my serious reading

I'm not too interested in housekeeping

Instinct told me I'd meet Frank one day

WHEN THE EDITOR of MODERN SCREEN discussed my writing this column he wasn't a bit helpful; he said I could talk about anything under the sun. He didn't know the territory was too big for me. For too long I've been a Jill of far too few interests. But one thing has always intrigued me—people. I have always put them in two classifications: Those I couldn't understand, those I understood too well. I'm among the first group—the ones who puzzle me.

WHY DO I FEAR THINGS that my common sense assures me are not hurtful? For instance, as you read this I will very probably be in Africa winding up my part in Mogambo, much to the disappointment of a lot of smallpox, sleeping sickness, malaria, and other assorted germs who will no doubt have made a good college try to cut my career (and life) short. That they will fail (I hope) will be mainly due to the medics who inoculated me before I left Hollywood. But how I would dread the needle when it came time to go down and take my shots . . . and how little the actual discomfort amounted to compared to the benefit I was to derive! This is how little any unpleasant prospect in life amounts to, I have come to think, in comparison with what you sometimes gain. But I don't want to preach. I just wanted to point out how I puzzle me.

People I know too well are those who push, who take over, who raise holy Ned when things work out to their disadvantage. And if you think it makes me feel like a sap to get cheated and say nothing about it, or to have someone step in front of me at the bank window, or catch the eye of the waiter I have been trying to get over to my table for ten minutes, or slam into the parking spot I have been slowly trying to jockey into—why, you are right.

"THEY MUST HAVE SEEN YOU COMING," my friends say when they examine my purchases and they're not kidding—they mean exactly that. It happens often to me. I was quite content when I walked into a Beverly Hills shop a few days before I left Hollywood, but I walked out fuming. I saw a little velvet top for a blouse which I liked. Another patron was examining it, and I caught sight of the price tag. When she decided not to take it, I found a salesgirl and told her I wanted it. She wrapped it up and then asked for an amount several dollars higher than the price I had seen on the tag. I knew then that she had recognized me; this was nothing new, raising the price for someone the store people feel can't afford to quibble. I wanted to protest, to tell her to keep it. But what's the use . . . I hate scenes. I paid and left.

rabbit eye tests prove ZONITE'S ABSOLUTE SAFETY to body tissues in feminine hygiene

Why do people do that to other people? I'm just asking . . . I'm not mad . . . now. It's even quite possible for me to imagine myself having lived a different life so that I could be the salesgirl and I would do the overcharging. In that case the question would be just as pertinent—why would I do it? The only answer I know is that people are that way, that's all. People are all sorts of ways they shouldn't be, and you either become indulgent of this and get along or you can fritter yourself to pieces.

A friend of mine plays golf weekends with a pathologist I shall call Dr. X. Dr. X is considered an honorable man in his profession and a leader in his branch of medicine—properly so, too. And he is a generous man. He is the first to reach for the lunch check, the first to contribute to a good cause. But the fact is that Dr. X is also a cheat. He cheats at golf for a dime a hole! Everybody who has played with him has caught him at it . . . yet they know the doctor doesn't think so. Some sort of mental block stands between him and the realization that he has a habit of overlooking penalties, strokes and most of the rules of the game. The odd thing, and the nice thing about it, is that all his friends in turn not only overlook this peculiarity, they have become fond of him for it! A hit confusing . . . hut warm.

DO YOU PUZZLE ANYONE? There is a man in our circle of acquaintances who is normal in every way except one—and that causes me to do just a bit of brow-knitting if we invite him to a dinner. He doesn't like pale looking food. It has to have a definite, warm color. He hasn't eaten a piece of fish in his life. To me, who can eat anything, this is beyond comprehension. But I have to admit, it is a fact. At that, I do have a little food fetish of my own. When I order iced tea in a restaurant I want it fresh—that is, the tea steeped and then cooled after I order it—and know I really get it that way. Not being the type who can send something back after ordering it, I have lately taken to stratagem. I order hot tea plus ice and then make my own iced tea on the table. If you like iced tea you are welcome to this idea. The tea tastes better and, besides this, the fact that you make it yourself satisfies that

For years, modern-thinking women have realized that vaginal cleanliness is a must. It's just as necessary as brushing one's teeth or taking a bath. The big problem is what is right to use for a cleansing antiseptic douche solution. What product can a woman BE SURE is powerfully effective, deodorizing yet soothing and absolutely safe to body tissues? Any woman worried about this intimate problem should read these facts and find out WHY ZONITE is a perfect solution.

Developed by a famous surgeon and scientist

The ZONITE principle was developed by a famous surgeon and scientist. The first in the world to be powerful enough yet positively non-poisonous, non-irritating.

Scientists tested every known antiseptic-germicide they could find on sale for the douche. No other type liquid antiseptic for the douche of all those tested proved so powerful yet harmless as ZONITE. And ZONITE is more than an antiseptic and germicide. It is also an amazing cleansing and healing agent. Because of this, ZONITE may be used as often as needed without the slightest risk of injury.

ZONITE'S Miracle-Action

ZONITE completely deodorizes. It guards against infection. ZONITE kills every germ it touches. It's not always possible to contact all the germs in the tract, but ZONITE immediately kills all reachable germs. It flushes out waste substances and leaves the vaginal tract so clean and refreshed. Costs only a few pennies per douche. Worth a fortune to feminine charm and health.

Always use as directed.

Tests made under methods developed in a government research laboratory

Tests of ZONITE's safety to body tissues were made to meet strictest scientific standards. ZONITE, as used in the douche, was put twice daily for three months into rabbits' eyes. Not the slightest irritation appeared. During the tests, Mr. Bunny lived like a pampered prince. He never had it so good all the while he graciously helped prove ZONITE is absolutely harmless to him—harmless to you. In fact, ZONITE is wondrously soothing.

urge to cook which is supposed to be in every woman—at least it takes care of as much urge to slave over a hot stove as I ever get!

LET'S GO BACK earlier in my life . . . when I was going to high school in Newport News, Virginia. There was a boy who caught my eye—and held it for two years during which time I did absolutely nothing about getting to meet him (let's not pretend that girls ordinarily don't try to meet boys they want to know). I'd see him walking down the street alone and pine to be alongside him. I'd see him with other girls and suffer. I must not have suffered in silence because I can remember these words from a schoolmate: "It's perfectly silly! You can get to meet him. Soandso knows him, and I'll get her to introduce me and then I'll introduce you!"

But I wouldn't agree and, to this day, I don't know why. There was another boy I saw in that period. He showed up as a singer with Tommy Dorsey and his orchestra. They played, he sang, I moaned, and then there were long years that passed. But one day in New York he made up for it. He invited me for a drive . . . which is how Frankie and Ava finally met. Did I know this would happen back in Newport News? Is that why I was content not to circulate more? Sometimes young girls have instincts like this. I can't say that this describes me. I don't have to have reasons for what I don't do . . . or do.

It has just occurred to me that there is a reason why I talk so much about people—for some time I have been trying to become a better example myself. If I had to start being Ava Gardner all over again I'd hope, of course, that I'd be just as lucky as I have been. Getting a chance to get into the movies was luck, and there is no point in calling it anything else. But aside from that there was something I failed to do until just lately, and that something I would now start at from the very beginning. That something is to work towards becoming a fully developed person. It was a great shock to me some years ago to realize an odd aspect about my apparent success on the screen. I was in a position now to get all I could possibly want from the world . . . but I couldn't use it! Yes, yes, I could put clothes on my back and surround myself with fine things in my home . . . but I felt there must be something fuller to life than just being a doll in a doll's house.

WHAT DID I KNOW? A little about acting, a little about dancing, a smidgen about music . . . that was me. About people—and you have to live your whole life with and around people—I was, as I still am, just puzzled. Since this included myself I didn't know how to really come alive, to express myself, to test my more serious capabilities and give myself a closer identification with my time in history and thus an inner satisfaction with my part in it.

Let me tell you how all this started . . . because it may happen to you . . . it should happen to all of us, I think! Some years ago I had to spend a Sunday in a strange town. There were no theatres or movies open, no events of any kind, and I didn't know a soul. I found myself terribly bored and couldn't wait until bedtime so I could go to sleep and get the day over. But when I did climb in for the night I became conscious of being displeased with myself. How was it that a whole new city with its fresh sights and faces had meant nothing to me? How was it that the things of my everyday life, the Hollywood I knew, escorts, a new gown, a smart place to show it off in, had become such props I couldn't do without them? There were fine parks in this city. There was a wonderful museum, I knew, and places of historical interest. Were these interests too simple for me? This is what I really thought at first. I considered that I was sophisticated. But then, inwardly, awoke an unpleasant truth. I wasn't too superior for these things; I wasn't mature enough. Around me was humanity moving in great new directions in a dynamic world and none of these even touched me in the little hurrow I had dug out for myself. I realized that moment that despite having apparently achieved success professionally, I had failed to develop character sufficiently, my general knowledge, my social possibilities, and was therefore really living a small life. That was when Ava Gardner wriggled out of her hole and looked around. (That, too, was when word got around that Ava was trying to be an intellectual, and people kidded her about it. Ava wasn't trying to be a great brain . . . she was just discovering that there was a satisfaction in using the one she had.)

I WON'T GO INTO EVERY STEP I took from that point on. Suppose I just skip to the results:

Who would suspect that achieving, not necessarily a knowledge, but just an appreciation for books, for music, for art in all its interesting forms, would help give a girl poise? I mean, maybe you would know this . . . but I didn't. And that was only one of the surprising results. I still haven't figured out just what the process is, but a little I know. The very fact that you can sit down and enjoy fine thoughts in a book or stirring musical themes and artistry at a concert must give you the one trait of character you can't get without earning it—a true sense of humility and, curiously enough, with that a true self-respect. I still don't understand how these two can be so closely related, but I know it is so. It must also be that the fine thoughts (and good thinking) which you get from literature, and the inspiration you get from music or a fine painting, are not stimulations which leave you unchanged. You grow a little each time in a good way. Maybe it causes you to expect something better from yourself and thus automatically enlarges and elevates your thoughts. Whatever it is, your attitude is finer and the people you meet know it and, as has been my experience, respond, in kind.

what lana does to men

I had also known Lana for a long time. She and my son, Bill, had tested for parts in her first picture. Bill lost; Lana won. The film was titled They Won't Forget, and apparently the public didn't forget. Lana had scarcely more than a walk-on part; but she wore one of those tight sweaters that made her famous. Even then, though still in her teens, she was evoking wolf whistles. The men ogled but kept hands off. Young Lana was regarded as beautiful jail-bait. But she was a headstrong, impulsive girl. It was her misfortune that this young girl should be turned practically overnight into a screen butterfly.

Lana, who had been denied much in the impoverished days of her youth and carried in her veins the blood of her gambling father, loved it all: the glamor, the excitement, even the uncertainty of the show world. It meant scads of men panting for a date with her, night clubs, dancing, music, and a prospect that could end only in glory. How many young girls have had this dream? Lana was the all-American blonde who flits through the minds of most males. To women she was the girl from across the tracks who beat the rap and made good. Pleasure-seeking Lana didn't work too hard for stardom. The adoring public and some high-powered press agents thrust it upon her. If she lacked a talent for acting, she had a genius for making mistakes. She was a young girl of 20 giddy on the wine of success, and not very receptive to the advice of older, wiser people.

THAT's how I viewed Lana when Tyrone Power became romantically entangled with her, and I told him so. "But you don't know the real Lana Turner," he said. "Let me bring her to your home. I want you to see Lana as I do." Now these old eyes had seen countless, hectic, short-lived romances among show people; but they still skeptically sought for the miracle— Until death us do part So I asked Ty to bring her for a visit.

We spent an evening together; and I thought, at long weary last, I had found the miracle. Lana, dressed simply and as demure as a girl fresh from the farmlands, could talk of nothing but Ty. And his chief subject was Turner. It was hard to see in her the brash young lass who had bought her clothes to match the fire-engine red of her first automobile and even tried to have her hair dyed the same color. Curled upon a sofa like a kitten and looking like the little girl next door, she hung on every word Ty spoke. The amazement showed in my face. Ty noticed it and grinned, "See—what did I tell you, honey?"

If she was putting on an act, it was better than anything she's done on the screen. I kept thinking of what a handsome couple they made; and of what beautiful children they could bring into the world. Later when she held in her hands only the ashes of a broken romance, Lana said she never really loved Ty; nor he her. They were simply good companions.

That I will never believe. While in the midst of making Green Dolphin Street, she slipped off to Mexico to visit Ty, risking the wrath of her studio, even suspension, when bad weather delayed her return to Hollywood two days. I'll admit that "good companionship" is not the most common commodity in Hollywood; but it's not that scarce, especially when your ab-for Colds and Sore Throat!

GARGLE Listerine Antiseptic as soon as you can. Prompt germ-killing action can often head off trouble or lessen its severity.

When you're overheated and go out into the cold night air, you may be letting yourself in for a troublesome cold, a nasty sore throat due to a cold...or worse.

Germ Invade Tissue

You see, fatigue and sudden changes of temperature may often lower body resistance. Then potentially troublesome germs called the "secondary invaders" can stage a mass invasion of the tissue. They can set up an infection, or aggravate one that is already started.

Then, if ever, Nature can use a helping hand to go after such threatening germs . . . to help guard against such a mass invasion . . . to help head off a cold before it gets entrenched. That is why, when you get home, it is wise to gargle with full-strength Listerine Antiseptic repeatedly.

Attacks "Secondary Invaders"

Listerine Antiseptic reaches way back on throat surfaces to kill millions of germs, including the "secondary invaders" that many doctors hold responsible for so much of a cold's misery.

Actual tests have shown that the Listerine Antiseptic gargle reduced germs on mouth and throat surfaces as much as 96.7% fifteen minutes after gargling, and up to 80% one hour after.

Always at the First Sniffle

Whenever you have sniffles, your throat is raw because of an oncoming cold, or you feel chilly or under par, start the Listerine Antiseptic gargle. You may thus spare yourself a nasty siege of trouble.

sence from the sound stages may mean idleness on the part of dozens of workmen. I say love is the only emotion strong enough to induce a girl into doing such a foolish act.

Later I visited her in her dressing room when she was making Cass Timberlane. Still the talk was all Ty. They wanted to make a picture together. He adored her daughter Cheryl. Life was wonderful. I still believe that she and Ty would have married if his divorce from Annabella had been final. It's on record that Annabella said she would give Ty a divorce whenever he wished it; but it's not on record that he was in great haste to get that little decree so he could marry Lana.

When the romance exploded, I called Lana and told her how much I regretted it. "So do I," she sighed, "but I've had a wonderful year. Ty's a great guy. From now on I'll carry my chin a little higher and work harder." Where had I heard those words before? It seems that everybody is "a great guy" or "great girl" when the end comes.

It is more than passing irony that Lana in her new picture, The Bad And The Beautiful, is used by a man to further his own ambitions but rejects her love when she is no longer useful to him. This cannot be applied to Tyrone Power. He never used Lana. During their romance he was as big a name as she. But I cannot say that about all the men in her life.

Let's flash back to the early days when Victor Mature, Turhan Bey, Tony Martin, and Bob Hutton were among her frequent escorts. They were all actors struggling toward big time in the movies; and being seen with glamorous Lana hurt them not one whit. Indeed, it was sufficient to get their pictures spread all over the papers. Lana was not the big star she is today, but she was a beautiful girl and the photographers' delight. It seems a long time ago but maybe you can remember what a striking couple blonde Turner and dashing, dark Mature made. Then there was Turhan Bey, who set feminine hearts aflutter with his suave, elegant continental manners. Just recently he reminded me that I had once said, "You look wicked, but you aren't." So he decided to do something about it. "I had great fun," he added, "but it certainly put a crimp in my bank account."

Greg Bautzer was her first great love; and this was unfortunate. He's one of the most eligible but most elusive bachelors in our town. Greg's a fine escort, but to take him seriously romantically is to invite heartache. Greg is a man who just naturally likes to have his arm decorated by a pretty girl swinging thereon. Handsome, virile, well-mannered, and prosperous, he's the dreamboat whom all girls think they can land until they turn around and suddenly he isn't there. Greg's not the marrying kind. But when he's with a girl, he's most attentive; so you think the latest gal on his arm is the love of his life.

Lana Turner, who describes Greg as "an escape artist," was no different. Like the other girls she took a headlong fling at the determined bachelor and got bounced off for her pains. Though he didn't marry her, he has remained a faithful, helpful friend to Lana through her stormy life. In some instances, however, he was indirectly responsible for her grief.

It began on her 19th birthday. Greg made a date to take Lana and her mother out for the evening, but at the last minute he begged off, claiming illness. Lana, at that time considering herself engaged to Bautzer, blew her top. Then the phone rang; and answering it was one of the biggest mistakes the girl ever made. On the other end of the wire was Artie Shaw with a line as smooth as silk. He didn't have to exhaust his extensive vocabulary to convince the furious girl that she should go out and celebrate with him. She'd show that Bautzer that a lady didn't have to sit home evenings awaiting the whims of the lord and master.

Now Artie was not among Lana's favorite people. They had met when making a picture, Dancing Co-ed. To put it mildly there were no heart throbs between the two. Artie can be classified as an intellectual snob.

No night clubs with music, dancing, champagne for Artie. That would have caused distraction; and he couldn't hear himself talk. He drove Lana down to the sea. It was a night made for love, with a full moon turning the surging tides to gold. Tumultuous Lana was still burning over the Bautzer slight. Artie turned on the charm; and let it be recorded that this gent is not lacking in that commodity when he wishes to dish it out.

He used a tactical talk familiar to most experienced women, starting with abstractions, literature, and the like; then ending the oration with a conversation piece about marriage and a cozy little home. That night they drove back to Hollywood, roused out the famous "Honeymoon Pilot," Paul Mantz, flew to Las Vegas and got married. For the ceremony, Artie pulled a ring off his finger for Lana to wear. She had a very good ring in her handbag—the one Greg Bautzer gave her to seal their engagement.

About this time Lana figured she ought to notify her mother about the event. She simply wired her that she had got married, but failed to state to whom. Her mother thought it had to be to Greg Bautzer. She was in for a dismal disillusionment.

So was Lana. Artie lost no time in starting to improve his bride—a matter that's become a habit with him. He wanted her to be everything from a cook to a philosopher. The case was hopeless. Lana tried, but the lessons didn't take. After four months of being brow-beaten, she locked Artie out of the house; called up Greg Bautzer, and said she'd had it. She asked him to get her out of her marriage.

You would have thought that "education" would have included a lesson on men for Lana. But it didn't. For a little while she concentrated on her career; and her efforts proved her capability for acting in Ziegfeld Girl. But she went on a real night club kick, making the rounds and keeping an eye peeled for eligible men.

When it comes to romance, she's a law unto herself. She usurps the prerogatives of most males, who, when they see a pretty girl, say, "That's the dish for me," and move right in. Well, Lana does the same. I've seen her in action. At a party we both attended, she cased the room, picked out an attractive man, walked over, stuck out her hand, and said, "I'm Lana Turner. Who are you?"

To her men are like new dresses to be donned and doffed at her pleasure. Seeing a fellow that attracts her, she's like a child looking at a new doll. It's got to belong to her. And like a child, she can knock the stuffing out of the doll in a week, discard it, and pick up a new one. Of a trusting nature, she seldom pauses to differentiate between heels and haloes.

While night-clubbing one night, destiny brought Steve Crane into her life. He came over to her table and greeted Lana by reminding her of his name. She remembered him as somebody she had met somewhere and invited him to join her party. They danced; and Lana promptly fell in love with him. That suited Steve fine. A reputed "tobacco heir," he was actually out here to make his fortune. Lana was a big name and could help him on his way. After a brief and passionate courtship, they were married.

A pall was quickly cast over that lovely affair by a girl named Carol Kurtz. She happened to be Steve's wife. They had separated but no divorce had become final. When angry Lana confronted him with the news, he gently tried to explain that he thought he'd been divorced. What a slip of memory. Lana, who was obviously weary of the boy by this time, quickly had her marriage annulled.

Steve got into the headlines by running his car off a cliff near Lana's home. It is said that he'd gone there to plead for a reconciliation. The girl wavered; then decided, for a change, not to marry the man. It was rumored that Steve, crushed with grief, had taken a sleeping potion and attempted to end his life in a car wreck. This has never been proven; but I went to the site, examined the auto tracks; and it certainly looked like no ordinary accident to me.

Life was getting complicated indeed for the gorgeous blonde; but there was more to come. Lana, now legally a single girl who had never been legally married to Steve, discovered she was going to have a baby. Steve's divorce was now final. They went to Tiajuana and got married again. There was nothing else to do. When the baby was six months old, she divorced Crane. Steve's still in Hollywood, happily making the rounds.

Lana got one thing out of her marriage to him—a daughter to whom she's devoted. And in fairness to Lana, I must point out a tragedy that may be responsible for her jumping from man to man. She's always wanted a large family; but an RH factor in her blood makes child-bearing extremely difficult for her. She lost two babies by miscarriages; and little Cheryl herself has had a tough fight for survival.

It was after her break-up with Crane that Lana latched onto Ty Power. When he stepped out of her life, Bob Topping moved in. It was her old pal Greg Bautzer who suggested to Lana that Bob might make a good mate. He was a well-known playboy, thrice married; but he had a fine family background and heir to a fortune. The only catch was that he was still legally wed to Arline Judge. Lana wanted no part of him. But Bob was persistent. He flooded her with flowers and telephone calls. Still Lana wouldn't yield. It remained for that old matchmaker, Johnny Meyers, to get them together. It happened in New York.

Lana was not greatly impressed by meeting the gentleman in the flesh. But she had to attend a premiere and had no escort. So she called up Bob and asked if he'd escort her to the theater. Would he? That guy was absolutely delighted. In fact, he was so delighted that on the way to the theater he slipped a couple of baubles in her purse—earrings set with huge diamonds. But Bob didn't believe that diamonds should be a girl's best friend. He continued his pursuit of Lana by inviting her to spend a white Christmas on the family estate in Connecticut. He went all the way by asking her to bring her daughter and mother along. It would be one big happy gathering. The girl gave in.

She was impressed by the culture of the Topping family. Her own background had been rough and rugged. The Toppings were unlike the newly rich she had known in Hollywood. Wealth had been in their family so long that the members took it for granted. But Lana and Bob's affair was to be high-lighted by comedy, tragedy, and the ridiculous. It began with a $25,000 party which Bob planned to toss for Lana at the Mocambo in Hollywood. His divorce from Arline had not become final; but we rather expected that he and Lana would make an engagement announcement. Imagine our bestarlement then when we received our invitations in the form of telegrams, and they were signed "Lana and Bob Topping." That little error in words caused such a furor that the whole shindig was canceled.

LANA's previous marriages had been elopements; and her one to Bob was, she insisted, to be the real thing with all the trimmings. There would be dignity about it. But the fate that dogged Lana was still at her heels. The marriage rites blew up into a farce. The setting was gorgeous with food, flowers, and champagne at the home of Billy Wilkerson, who had discovered Lana for pictures as she sat sipping a soda at a drug store fountain. Twelve guests and one lone reporter were invited to the actual ceremony. But at the reception following, many more people, including 63 photographers, showed up and turned the celebration into a maelstrom. Under the impact, Lana was reported to have swooned, but she later denied that. Even the minister was rebuked by his church for tying the knot.

They began their honeymoon in a bungalow at the Beverly Hills Hotel. To get a story which I'd been assigned, I crashed right in on them. It was mid-afternoon, but I remember they were still in their dressing gowns. Lana wore a pair of old bedroom mules as a concession to comfort. After their disastrous brush with the press at the wedding reception, they'd suddenly developed a phobia against people with pad and pencils and cameramen with flashlight bulbs.

Fearing they would be hounded by the press, they had canceled a honeymoon in Palm Springs and decided to go directly to Europe. We had a nice conversation, however, and I warned them that they might as well go along with the press in London and New York. That was the only way they could expect to be treated kindly by the boys and girls whose job it is to get stories and pictures of famous people.

My advice went unheeded. In London, a press conference was set up. Lana arrived late, keeping reporters waiting. When she did show up, she flipped off the reporters with a few casual comments. Of course, they were written up in a scathing manner, which made them angrier than ever at the press.

They went into hiding in the East; and then became virtual hermits in a $90,000 house in Holmby Hills. But they kept contact with the world through the aid of six television sets. The roof of their home had so many aeriels it looked like something descended from Mars. Hollywood was amazed at the Toppings' retirement, because if there ever were a play-boy and a play-girl, they were Bob and Lana.

During this period, Lana dropped by my house for an interview. Getting a story out of her was rugged. She was too divinely happy to be doing anything that would make news; and I must say she looked it. She had become nearly domesticated, and who was interested in reading about that?

Immediately after the marriage ceremony, one of the pair had murmured, "This is forever." There are two schools of thought on this. Some claim Bob made the statement; others, that she did. But after the tragic loss of her two babies, reports that the Toppings were having serious upsets became more and more frequent. Finally Bob went to Oregon on a fishing trip, presumably "to think it over," and neglected to come back home.

Now officially separated again, Lana began casting her blue peepers about and they lit on Latin Lover Fernando Lamas. They were co-starring in The Merry Widow; and I believed the romance was a publicity stunt. I still think it began that way. But the affair turned into love. And for film fans it made exciting news: The Latin Lover and the Blonde Beauty. Lana went to Nevada and divorced Topping. Almost everyone expected her to wed Lamas. I didn't. In the middle of the romance, Lamas had whispered to me, "I don't think we'll ever marry. She's too demanding."

THE explosion was sudden and final. Fernando took both Lana and Ava Gardner to Marion Davies' party for the Johnnie Rays. Lana's eye went aroving again. This time it fell on Tarzan—Lex Barker. Being out of town, I wasn't present at the affair, but was told that when Lex and Lana danced, she snuggled up. Fernando's blood boiled over. And we soon were notified that the romance between Turner and Lamas had gone kaput. "It's true," Fernando told me cautiously. "But I hope we can always be friends and make a good picture out of Latin Lovers." In this they were scheduled to co-star; but within a few days, Fernando was dropped from the cast with a bang, and replaced by Ricardo Montalban.

You could see the way the wind was blowing. The stories emanating from Leo the Lion showed Lana in a sympathetic light. The general tenor of the story was that poor Lana had helped Fernando get his studio contract; and now he showed his gratitude by treating her badly. Lana had nothing to do with his movie contract.

THE reason, I believe, that he was dropped from Latin Lovers is that the studio figured that instead of coming out loving, they'd come out with their dukes up. Even if the picture was made without mayhem, the public wouldn't believe the story because of the busted romance. Either Lamas or Turner had to go; and she was more important. So Fernando got the axe.

He didn't carry a torch for Lana, but quickly latched onto Arlene Dahl. As for Lana, she's still casting those baby blues around and alighting on no man of particular interest. But you can bet your bottom dollar it won't be long. The pattern will be repeated. I daresay she'll have plenty of romances and more marriages—that is, if she enjoys the life span insurance companies give most women. But life with Lana has become so full, so repetitious, so enriched with material possessions that I don't believe any love or marriage would, or could, last her until the end of her days.

bing crosby's future

(Continued from page 33) were amazed beyond words that the malignancy had gone so far that there was nothing to be done to help her.

"It is just a matter of hours, days, weeks—and we'll keep trying. But it is hopeless," said the doctor who is also one of Bing's closest friends.

For a moment it seemed that Bing, who had never suspected the extent of Dixie's illness, would collapse. Then that aura of impenetrable dignity, that seems to color his personality at all times, came to his rescue.

"Dixie isn't to be told," he whispered, "but the boys must know."

Weep for him in that hour of agony when he summoned his four sons before him at home and told them the truth about their mother.

More than that, he told them, that as hard as it might seem, as impossible, they must play a role of pretense and acting. That they must appear to be gay and happy though their hearts were breaking. He told them Dixie was being sent home from the hospital within a few days because there was nothing more that could be done for her. And she was never to suspect from their faces or words or actions that she was soon to leave them.

He asked his wonderful boys to pretend to their mother that they were so sure she was well back on the road to recovery that they wanted to return to their vacation in Elko and that they expected her to join them as soon as she was able to travel after surgery.

And—the day Dixie came home—Bing had a peculiar welcome awaiting her.

HER bedroom was littered with blueprints and plans for a house in Palm Springs, a place long contemplated by the whole family, Dixie in particular, but never realized.

"We'll spend a lot of time there, honey," he told Dixie. "It will be just a little place, no chi-chi, no big house like this one. We won't have it an inch bigger than we need to hold the six of us."

"Now here, Wilma," he said, using the family name to kid her, "you get busy and start looking over these plans and pick out what you like best. And—no loafing! Start selecting the carpets and drapes and color schemes and get things ready in a hurry. Maybe we can spend Christmas there—and New Year's if you get at it."

"Honey," he went on swallowing a big lump in his throat, "you are coming along so well, I'm going ahead with making Little Boy Lost in Europe. I'll be gone about three weeks. When I get back—don't let me find you haven't started our house in Palm Springs."

And, so, Dixie sat up in bed and started directing every nail and stone to go into that little home she had wanted for so long—and which she was never to see.

The gleam of happiness came back to her eyes as she planned the desert home, on the edge of the new golf course. Naturally, Bing would be happiest living near a golf course, Dixie told her doctors and nurses.

Her plans for the happiness of her Bing and the boys seemed to be making a new woman of her. A miracle was happening. Dixie, unbelievably, was able to leave her bed.

In an incredibly short time, she was up and around and driving herself to the hospital for a series of treatments to which she was making response beyond the most prayerful hopes of her doctors.

Best of all, she was able to meet daily with Harold Grieve, the decorator, about the part that was the most fun—the color schemes, the drapes and carpets, pictures and pots and pans, the part of homemaking so dear to every woman's heart.

"Remember, nothing fussy," she would remind Grieve, "just something my five boys will like."

And so the house was built, and the gray-and-beige carpets were down and the desert-pink drapes were up when, with shocking suddenness of pain, suffering and then blessed coma, the curtain mercifully lowered for Dixie.

The reason I tell you about this little house in Palm Springs in such minute detail is that it will be Bing's real home in the future.

When he originally acquired the property atop a knoll about ten miles east of Palm Springs, he gave half of it to his pal-confidant and songwriter, Jimmy Van Heusen. Jimmy started his house at the same time Bing did and has already moved into his part of the isolated male paradise where men, without women (Van Heusen is a bachelor) can play golf all day in the sunshine and come home to hearty, diet-less dinners, pipes, open, blazing hearths and the music, music, music that both men love.

It is here that the boys will spend their holidays with their "old man" in an intimacy and closeness of association the big, sprawling Crosby mansion in Holmby Hills never afforded.

BING has always been interested in his kids as individuals. Now he is dedicated to them. Not that he will be maudlin or overly sentimental to his motherless brood. Far from it.

As an example, not long ago he got wind that Gary was having a bit too much of a tres gay time at Stanford. Much driving around in the new car Bing and Dixie had given him when he set off for the Northern California campus; very little concentration on his studies.

And Gary was getting fat. Bing had been fat, himself, when he was a kid—even when he first came to Hollywood. And, he wasn't too overly studious about his career.

But, as many a father has said before him, it was a case of "Don't do as I do (or did). Do as I say!"

Bing took Gary's car away from him to the tune of much indignant howling from the injured member of the Crosby clan.

"Hey, Dad," Gary telephoned from Stanford (charges reversed), "how am I going to get around?????"

"You're round enough," his pappy snapped, "now start walking some of it off!"

As of this writing, the car has not yet been restored to that fine star of song and hoof, Monsieur Gary Crosby—and you can rest assured it won't be until pop gets a look at the midyear scholastic reports in January.

If Gary ever had any idea that he was already a star of song, (and his records with Bing have sold like hotcakes) he's had that notion knocked out of any swelled head he might have been developing by his partner in song.

Recently, Bing was approached by an agent who had a sponsor wanting to star Gary in a TV program directed toward teen-agers. Knowing that Bing is insistent that Gary finish college before turning professional entertainer, the agent approached Bing with the idea that Gary could do it during his summer vacation.

"Who's the sponsor?" asked Crosby, Sr., "and what do they offer?"

The agent told him a canned meat company, and the figure was $2500 weekly for Gary.

"They've got the right hambone to commercialize," Bing laughed, "but my boy's not that good—yet. There are too many fine performers who have been years training themselves to get that kind of money—and the job should go to one of them. Right now they're just buying the Crosby part of Gary's name. To get up in that salary bracket, he must wait until he can deliver on his talent."

Could anything really demonstrate better his love for Gary, his concern that his boy not become a spoiled prodigy robbed forever of the wonderful satisfaction of getting to the top on his own?

Of the twins, 17-year-old Phillip and Dennis, 'ole Pappy has a hard time concealing his pride. Both boys are enrolled at the University of Washington, studying animal husbandry. While they, too, have performed on their Dad's radio show—their real interests are centered in the big Crosby ranch in Elko, Nevada.

They are serious boys, thoughtful, polite, considerate—already as quiet and retiring as the ranchhands they work with and admire so much.

It was Phillip who quietly suggested to his father that he (Bing) study up on his French before leaving for Little Boy Lost scenes in Paris.

"Oh, almost everyone I'll come in contact with speaks English there," Bing tossed it off. "Why bother?"

"It's cheaper when you speak the lingo," replied Phillip with a perfectly straight face, "and you aren't the fastest guy in the world with a buck, you know!"

AND, last—but far, far from least, there's 14-year-old Lindsay, "the little fellow" to his Dad and his brothers, the "baby." Oh, Bing can be a strict father to his heart's content and talk about his boys who have proved they are man-sized—but he's going to be a mother and father to Lindsay—because he can't help himself.

All the deep tenderness in Bing's nature, that sometimes seems to manifest itself fully only when he is singing, goes out to encircle Lindsay and hold him dear in warm affection.

He will keep Lindsay very close to him, particularly during these next so-very-important years to a boy of Lindsay's age and sensitivity.

Lindsay will be kept in school in Los Angeles—he is currently a student at Loyola High School. And when Bing goes traveling—and most certainly he will go traveling because he loves it—I think Lindsay will be by Bing's side, very close, very warm and near to the father who loves him so much.

This is the way it should be and will be because "little fellows" can become puzzled and hurt and too lonely when they are out on their own too soon in life.

When I say that Bing will travel, I mean on a large scale. Like many Hollywood stars who are clams in Hollywood, he loves Europe, feels a freedom there not felt at home and revels in the open admiration of the fans who appear to be able to admire celebrities without attempting to tear the buttons off their clothes as many of the native variety do.

His favorite going-to-Europe partner is his wise and witty writer, Bill Morrow, who is responsible for so much of the subtle humor, always in good taste, in Bing's radio shows.

Bing and Bill were together in Paris the summer of '50 and had a wonderful time for themselves being just what they were, "yokels from Hollywood."

Bill is a wonderful buffer for Bing. He has such a delightful way of turning down hostesses, continental or homegrown, that the dear charmers never know they have been bypassed in favor of a stroll down Champs Elysées or a bachelor dinner "stag" in London.

It isn't often easy, this job of "getting Bing off the hook" because the people who know Bing and admire him as ardently as the wildest sidewalk fan, often reach into the upper echelon of European society, diplomacy and—recently, royalty.

One cause which particularly appealed to Bing and which he was eager to do was the golf tournament just outside London in which he was teamed with his old nemesis, Bob Hope, against two top British comedians.

The reason Bing agreed to play the exhibition match is because the proceeds were to go to the Playing Fields Fund, favorite charity of the Duke of Edinburgh, and dedicated to raising money for playgrounds and athletic endeavors to the homeless, bombed out and orphaned children of England.

The result? Bing and Bob lost to the Britishers. But he never will regret having made that appearance, even in the pouring rain. A lot of money was raised for the kids.

THE next day, at his hotel, a letter was delivered to Bing. It was from the popular and beloved Prince Phillip, Duke of Edinburgh, who, in his own handwriting, thanked the American star for what he had done for English children and asking him to accept, in the grateful spirit in which it was given, one of the Duke's "school ties"—one of the greatest tributes an Englishman can pay a friend! (And I didn't get that story from Bing who will die when he reads it here!)

Nor will he be happy that I tell you that one of the first telegrams to arrive at the Crosby house of mourning came from General Dwight D. Eisenhower, President-elect of our United States, who, with millions throughout the nation and abroad, expressed heartfelt sympathy over Dixie's death.

Famous or unknown—I happen to know that Bing read all the letters and wires sent to him and they did much to help him bear up in his time of deep bereavement.

Perhaps it was the greatest thing in the world—for him—that he was in the middle of a picture when his loss came. Although his studio, Paramount, and his producer, William Perlberg, would have given him days, weeks, even an indefinite postponement—he insisted on coming back to work the day after Dixie's funeral.

To his producer, director, co-workers and the crew, it was an ironically cruel thing that the only sequences remaining to be shot were those of an ex-GI, returning to France who has just learned that the French girl he married and who bore him a son he has never seen, is—dead!

Most of the workers on a movie set are pretty casehardened. In Hollywood, they have worked through the most extraordinary happenings. But strong men couldn't stand this.

Bing could—and did. "And if these scenes don't earn this wonderful guy an Academy Award," William Perlberg later told me, "they should never gold-leaf another statuette. Just a crooner? He's a great actor."

Yes, Bing will go on. He will walk ahead marshalling, guiding, cherishing those young ones near and dear to him; sharing his friendship with his cronies; being humble and dignified when honors come to him, proud when honors come to those he loves.

But, he will go on—alone.

love story—nine years young

(Continued from page 43) the sun—except himself. So the doll, like many before and after her, made a play for him, not knowing he hates predatory women.

She was much more important than he, and persistent. She suggested that he ask her for a date. He didn't. She hinted that it would be dandy if he took her for a drive one day. He didn't. Finally, when he either had to make a scene or go into action, he went into action. He has a strong man's aversion to feminine scenes but he drove to Malibu, stopped by a small, neat house.

In the living room there was a beautiful girl with golden hair and a sunny smile. "This is my wife," said Mr. Lancaster. "How do you do?" said Norma Lancaster to the speechless doll. "It's such a long drive down from Hollywood, I'm sure you want to freshen up."

Burt originally kept silent about his private life because, like so many very masculine men, he's afraid of admitting he's sentimental. As an example of this, about two years ago Norma hinted she would appreciate a mink coat for Christmas. It didn't turn up under the Christmas tree but just ahead of her birthday, which comes in July, Burt brought a mink coat home in a plain box and handed it to Norma as though it were a pound of rice.

Norma had it on in a second. She whirled delightedly, then said, "But Burt, we've made so many additions to the house, we can't afford this."

"No," said Burt, "but you're glad I got it just the same, and so am I."

It is in character, therefore that a completely sentimental thing broke him down into talking about his family. He received a fan letter which said, "I don't believe you've got a beautiful wife and four kids. If you did, why should you hide them?" He showed Norma the letter. "This is a great family," he said, "so let's tell the world about it."

THAT family ideal has always come first with him from the very day he met Norma and fell in love instantly. The first time they ever saw one another was in the bitter war winter of 1944. The place was the battered town of Montecatini, Italy.

It was one of those miracles that make you believe in fate. Burt was just a tired G.I. among a lot of other tired G.I.s. Norma was a dancer with a USO unit.

It was complete happenchance that Norma Marie Anderson was in the USO troupe, because she was neither a professional singer nor dancer. She had been a stenographer up until then in the office where the USO acts were booked. But her beauty, sex appeal and general radiant good nature stood out so that when a girl in the unit fell ill, it was quite natural that somebody should ask Norma if she'd like to go overseas. Maybe she couldn't keep a time step, but she had what the boys wanted—and then some.

Burning with a bright patriotic fervor, and also not exactly annoyed with the idea of being surrounded by thousands of men, Norma and the other girls soon discovered one disconcerting fact. Their entertainment of the G.I.'s consisted solely of what they could project across the footlights. Off stage, they were captured by the brass.

Thus the blonde Miss Anderson was more than out of line when, as the jeep in which she was riding, reached Montecatini she noticed one particular broad-shouldered, slim-hipped soldier in the group crowded around.

"Gee, who's that?" she asked the colonel sitting beside her.

The colonel didn't know, but eagerly urged, he said he could find out.

"Find out if he's married," Norma said.

The colonel was a gentleman, as well as Cupid's messenger. He soon came back with the fellow's name, his unmarried status, and the fact that he'd set up a blind date for that night after the show.

The only trouble with that was that Mr. Lancaster nearly didn't keep the date. He had got into a poker game, early evening, and was busily losing his shirt. He hates to be defeated at anything and never is until he drops in his tracks, so that evening, he stayed in the game until he won back his shirt and all the other guys' shirts, too. Then he went over to the dance hall where the USO troupe was glittering that time. He took one look at Norma and was a gone goose.

IT HAPPENED TO ME

About ten years ago, my family and I went to the country for a vacation. While at White Lake in Monticello, New York, a beautiful young girl took care of the children for us in the hotel.

I had completely forgotten about this girl until many years later when I went to the movies—there on the screen was the girl from the country. Now she was a famous actress and her name was none other than Shelley Winters.

Ina Joyce Fisherman
Brooklyn, New York

He can laugh at himself now for the way he acted that evening. "I hate to dance," he confesses, "but that night I suddenly was old-fashioned waltzing, and new-fashioned rumba-ing and whatever that band wanted to beat out. I'd get one step with Norma in my arms and 90 other guys would cut in, and they'd get one step and I'd cut back. I kept that up until they blew us out of the hall at three AM, but by then I had another date with this dish."

However, this was the Army in war time. At dawn that morning, the USO unit, including Norma Marie Anderson, was flown several hundred miles north to Caserta. At eight AM PFC Lancaster, learning this bit of news, went AWOL, hitch-hiked to Caserta, and saw Miss Anderson for all of a half-hour before the MP's caught up with him and slapped him in custody, back in Montecatini.

So what did Miss Anderson do then, the bold thing? She went AWOL, and got back to Montecatini. By this time the lovers had known one another two whole days, Burt had served his punishment, so they again went AWOL, only together this time, to Pisa, the one that has the leaning tower. And it was in the Leaning Tower that Burt proposed and in these words, "I want to have some blond children," he said.

"How many?" breathed Norma.

"Four."

"All right," she said.

They got married that very afternoon in a fast Italian civil ceremony. They didn't dare wait, you see, knowing the MP's were breathing on their necks, knowing it was wartime, knowing they might never see one another again. And the MP's really did catch up with them, but good. Norma was taken back to her USO troupe and confined to quarters. Burt was hauled off to Montecatini and what happened to him wasn't a honeymoon.

THEY didn't see one another again until Labor Day, in New York, but by now the war was over, and Burt was about to be out of uniform. He didn't know what he wanted to do in civilian life but Norma said to take his time, she could keep right on with her job as stenographer, only right then Burt was discovered by a theatrical producer, in an elevator, and Norma discovered Jimmy was on the way—and you know the rest.

That is, you know the rest except how much each of his children has changed Burt's character. He came out of the war like many another G.I. He was bitter. He was poor. He felt much of life was all wrong, and he wanted to do something about that. He wanted to reform things and he wanted to make some one pay and pay. At the moment that Hal Wallis offered him a Hollywood contract, as the result of his appearance in a single play, The Sound of Hunting, he owned only one suit and couldn't have paid the rent on their flat if it hadn't been for Norma's earnings. But he made Wallis pay. He thought then money was the answer to most problems.

Now it's a standard Hollywood compliment to say of a fellow that he can spot phoneys at 60 paces and hate them. But this attitude is not true of Burt. He certainly can spot phoneys—but he has a perfectly open admiration of them, if they are getting away with their phoniness.

Jimmy began the change in him. They named the baby, who looks so much more like his father than the other three, for Burt's father—but their hearts shook when they first saw him. Because he was club footed.

Burt had loved his wife very much up until then, but after that, he shifted almost to admiration. Because she took the situation with absolute courage. "Let's see as many doctors as we have to until we find the one who can cure the baby."

By the time Jimmy was cured—he's the sturdiest, healthiest kid imaginable today—Billy was on the way, and Burt knew a lot more about human kindness. Though his contract belonged to Wallis, the first Lancaster producer was Mark Hellinger, a deeply talented, highly sentimental and completely cynical man. Actually Mark wanted Wayne Morris for The Killers but Wayne had been on the Warner payroll all during the war years. So when Warners wanted to charge all that money against the production, Mark got Lancaster simply because he was big and he was cheap.

Together they made The Killers and Brute Force and they suited one another's mood because they were both hard-boiled New Yorkers. The two pictures were hits. Burt was an overnight star, but I'll always remember Mark saying of him at that time, "This is only a sky rocket, not a star. He'll tumble because already he's arguing with everybody. Already, he thinks he knows about direction, he thinks he knows about production, he thinks he knows about writing. In another year or so, he'll be unendurable."

It looked like a confirmation of Mark's theory when Burt promoted enough money to buy half his contract away from Wallis in order to do the bitter but truthful picture, All My Sons. It was a flop. Burt didn't alibi. He went quietly back to Wallis and made another picture. Then on his own time and money made Kiss The Blood Off My Hands, which you may remember was just as jolly as the title and flopped horribly, too.

Contrast those titles with The Flame And The Arrow, which was all fun and action, and made a fortune. Or with The Crim- son Pirate, which did the same, and was ditto. This was the evidence of the softening influence of Jimmy and Billy Lancaster on their father, and of the sound sense of Norma. Of course, Burt still thought he knew a lot about production, direction and writing. He still thinks that—and he's darned tooting. He does.

The sum of all this is what makes him so often moody and hard to understand. He hasn't only a dual nature, but a triple one. One part of him is all artist. When he is acting a scene he is completely lost to anything outside of him. Come Back, Little Sheba is complete miscasting for him. He went into it knowing the whole picture had to belong to Shirley Booth. Nevertheless, he was as excited as his kids with their Christmas joys over the challenge of playing the off-beat role of a drunk who is a fugitive from AA. The part called for him to look middle-aged, defeated. Just the same he gave his finest screen performance and somehow he subdued that vigorous body of his into looking thoroughly spent.

The business man in him is what makes him get such a boot out of his personal productions, which are called "Norma Productions" for his wife, and actively headed up by his friend, Harold Hecht. Burt sticks his nose into every detail on those: cost sheets, set design, the original script idea, the scenario, the direction, the casting. The artist in him keeps on bumping into the business man, and he spends too much on the films in one way, and then drives himself crazy by not having spent enough in some other.

He hasn't actually much money sense, anyway, though he fondly thinks he has. Sob stories get him and he always has a bunch of retainers hanging around from his circus or carnival days to whom he continually slips cash. When Norma announced that their third baby was coming, he decided it would be thrifty to buy a small house. He bought in the section which he calls "the poor man's Bel-Air," which is actually high in the hills over Supulveda Boulevard and very beautiful. The house actually was a simple, inexpensive one—whereupon he started re-altering it and invested more than $100,000 on top of the purchase price. Yet one of these alterations gives you the key to his character: he had a tremendous kitchen put on the house. It has everything in it a kitchen can have, a washing machine, a drying machine, a dishwasher, garbage disposal and all the mixing, grinding and liquefying gadgets. Also it has what Burt calls "a real family table." This is hard wood and no amount of childish spilling or mug-banging could hurt it. It can easily seat ten about its great circle in high chairs, as un-hurttable as the table. Off the kitchen, there is the children's playroom, which opens right out on the lawns where the kids' athletic equipment is set up.

There is nothing in the playroom that can be hurt, either. There's a TV set there, and radios, blackboards, toys, and all the furniture is scaled down to kid size. Good practical linoleum is on the floor. So stains of muddy little feet, or the tracks that the two Boxer puppies or the four kittens bring in as they wander casually in and out through the two big sliding glass panels, which serve both as doors and the whole side of the room, don't mean a thing.

THE Lancasters do have a tremendous, very beautiful living room, complete with a projection booth for showing movies. They also have a formal dining room. They don't go in either room more than once a week.

That's because they live entirely for and with the children. They have a cleaning woman who comes in by the day, to keep the place spic and span, but they decided long ago they didn't want a cook. This was because Burt felt, with his work, the only time he would see a lot of his kids was evenings and Sundays. Norma is an excellent cook, and so is he. This is another little thing he learned in Italy and he can make the best fettucini or spaghetti you ever tasted.

So the moment he lands home from the studio, he heads toward the kitchen or the kids' playroom. The children literally crawl all over him, and he often has Jimmy sitting on top his head, Billy hanging off one shoulder and Susiebet sitting on his lap, all simultaneously. Susie, for no known reason, is fascinated by his teeth and its the craziest sight you ever watched to see that big man sitting in the old-fashioned rocker he bought for the kitchen, holding his mouth wide-open while a very small girl carefully counts, for the hundredth time, how many teeth he has.

THUS the third side of his nature is this "Daddy" side—and it is the one that is becoming the most dominant. It has made him reject The Naked And The Dead and want to do amusing, escape pictures like The Flame And The Arrow and his newest one, His Majesty O'Keefe because he now believes that if you give people happiness you give them the most important of all things. And it is the side of him that has given the lie to Hellinger's dire forecast.

Besides, Burt's discovered the "kind" side of people. He found it out the day Billy was stricken with polio, and in an instant Warners suspended production on Jim Thorpe so he could be by his boy's side. He found it out through the doctor and therapists who worked with Billy, so that he is now nearly all well. It humbled him enough that he quietly goes to PTA meetings with Norma, and school board meetings and the like.

He's still no saint. He still blows his top over what he thinks are stupidities or social inequalities. He's still madly high-brow about music (going for Bach and Richard Strauss particularly) and lowbrow about prizefights and other athletic contests. He still hasn't any "little courtesies" at all—like opening car doors or lighting cigarettes for languishing ladies. But he's all man, and he's getting close to being all heart, and nothing would surprise me less than to have the world discover him as a very great human being.

"No, I'm not," he said. "No hurry at all. Not that I have anything against women. For Pete's sake, don't print that. I love women. But the way I figure is, I got time."

He was wearing a box-back coat, a choker collar, a string necktie, and the sort of bucolic, semi-banged hair-comb that suggested he might have been on his way out of a burning building—or off a burning deck. None of it was strictly out of character. Away from the screen, he dresses habitually as though having barely had time to escape a holocaust of some really dire nature. Now he explained with considerable precision that his part in this picture—Nearer My God To Thee—was that of a Purdue University tennis player of reasonably prominent talents who got a young lady off the sinking ship but didn't make out very well himself.

"But about this marriage business," he said. "I'm only 22. Young. What could I offer a wife? I'm not in the big money, don't let this movie actor business fool you. Maybe in a few years, but that's beside the point. Maybe in a few years I'll be out on—I'll be right back where I started. Then again, how do I know how I'm going to feel later? So I'm crazy about a girl when I'm 22, so when I'm 30 I'm not. Wouldn't be fair to her, wouldn't be fair to me. And like I was saying, what could I offer her anyway? A second-hand car and a house not big enough to—"

"—swing a cat by the tail."

"Well, you could always get yourself another hobby. No, what I was thinking, just not big enough to live in. These midget houses can be murder."

The corned beef and cabbage came—Fox must use pressure cookers—and Wagner stared at it suspiciously. "Executive fare," he said.

"You rate around here."

"Oh, no. Anybody can—" An arrested look of horror crossed his face. He got the waitress back. "Look, isn't anybody allowed to ask for the executives' menu?"

The waitress didn't say yes and she didn't say no.

"Holy cow," said Wagner. "I do it every day. I just thought anybody— Look, have I been doing something wrong?"

The waitress and Julian laughed. Apparently it didn't amount to breach of contract.

"Let's skip my romances," Wagner said after a while and two slices of beef, "mainly because I haven't got any romances. Dates though."

Melinda Markey?

"Sure. Melinda Markey. Wonderful. Wonderful girl. They're all wonderful. I mean, why would you date what you didn't like? Melinda I've known—" He made a gesture covering roughly a period dating from the arrival in Hollywood of Cecil B. DeMille. "She's a girl who has fun at anything. Indoor, outdoor, picnic, dancing, I don't care what. You name it, she loves it. How lucky can you be?"

"You or her?"

"Her for being the way she is, me for getting to date her. One thing, I don't mean to sound particular, but one thing I can't take in a girl is this tired business. You know, bored? All this is so childish? Much rather be home with a good book? No, you can have those. They think they're tired? Well, they are tired—period. You know what I mean? Really tired. But not Melinda. One time we got into a lecture by mistake. No kidding, we thought it was a bop session. It was something, I don't know, trends in Elizabethan literature, I'm not sure. Maybe worse than that. So we were way down front and couldn't very well leave after the guy had started. So we stayed, and she liked it. Anyway, she made like she was liking it, which is even better."

Wagner and Miss Russell exchanged a long, mock-sultry look. "Mmmm," said Wagner.

WASN'T there a Babs Darrow, like Miss Markey—a daughter of the Gene Markeys when Mrs. Gene Markey was Joan Bennett—a fledgling actress?

"Oh, very definitely, there is a Babs Darrow. Very, very definitely. And you know what? She is what I would describe as the ideal party girl."

In what respect?

"In the respect—now don't let this floor you—that you can walk away from her as soon as you get to the party. Just walk right away. That's what I call wonderful."

An extension of remarks seemed to be called for.

"Oh, not for that reason, nothing of the kind. But because you know she can take care of herself, you know what I mean? Take five steps toward the ice cream, and she's surrounded by the loyal opposition. She's a beautiful girl, you know. Beautiful? Words fail me. Words absolutely fail me."

"Do your girls have to be beautiful?"

Wagner polished off his plate, finished his coffee and reached for a cigarette. "Noooo—I wouldn't say that. Or would I? You threw me a curve then. Let me stop and think about it." He stopped and thought about it. It came ultimately to this: "If a girl looks beautiful to me, then she's beautiful. In my eyes, you know what I mean? In other words, almost all girls are beautiful because almost all girls have a man who thinks so. Maybe I should go in for philosophy. Maybe I'm wasting my time around here."

So what was his criterion for beauty?

"I don't know. The girl next door, I guess. I mean, I sort of like them to look like the girl next door. I mean, I do unless I get to thinking about it real hard, and then I figure, well, if the girl next door's all you want, go next door then and stop beating your brains out all over town. I don't know, maybe girls next door are a dime a dozen. Maybe that's a bad steer. It's funny, but just when I've convinced myself that's the type for me, I see Marlene Dietrich somewhere and flip my lid. I mean, I imagine she lives next door to someone but it sure isn't me or anyone I know. And anybody who doesn't think Marlene Dietrich's a beautiful woman is on his way to the rockin' chair. It's a tough deal to figure."

Well and good. On with the list then?

"Well, not a list exactly. I just date certain girls and they date me, and they date other guys, too. I date Debbie Reynolds quite a lot, maybe you know. She's the kind of girl—well, I'll tell you the kind of girl she is. You go skiing and she doesn't wait for you to tie her straps. She ties them herself. That might not sound like a lot but believe me, it is. There are so many girls who wouldn't think of doing it, have to wait around until you've been Sir Galahad or Walter Raleigh or whoever it is. And I'm exactly the kind of guy who wouldn't think of doing it for them until it's too late, and they've decided I'm a self-centered jerk with no manners."

"Debbie and I are both sort of in what you'd call the bop element, too. She's gone than I am, and I went two years ago. We like the same things, and—I don't know, it's just like I was saying, she's a wonderful, happy girl, a very happy girl, and I'm crazy about happy girls, all life and no phonies."

JULIAN, the publicist, made soft noises at this point that sounded like "keep it on the lot." Miss Reynolds is employed by another studio.

"Oh, sure," said Wagner. "Well, there's Charlotte Austin who works here at Fox, she's another sort of person I date and I'm always glad to see, and you know why? Because she's glad to see me. That's important. I don't mean for my ego or anything like that, but you can strictly tire of these girls who come up to you with this routine of 'Hello-Bob-sit-down-and-listen-to-what's-been-happening-to-me.' Charlotte's one of the warmest people I ever met, and I swear, she does care what I've been doing and what I feel like. Not that I'm the most fascinating conversationalist in the world or my biography's anything much, but it makes you feel real nice to be approached like that? Am I talking too much?"

Hardly. It's your interview.

"All right. Then there's—or pardon me, here she is." The boss's daughter had entered the commissary and sat down with the Russell-Mitchum retinue. There is a Darrlyn Zanuck and a, somewhat younger, Susan Zanuck. This was Susan, a lovely blonde girl. Wagner lowered his voice.

"You see what I mean. But that's not all. She's been a real help and a friend right from the start of this acting business, besides giving it to me in the short ribs when I need it. She's been close to the industry all her life, you know, and you can't fool her. I'd known Darrlyn before and that was how I got to know Susan. We met at a wedding. Well, she's completely honest. When I made my first test here, she took the trouble to come over to me one day and tell me she'd liked it. Then a few weeks ago I made another test, and we met on the lot. 'I saw your test the other day,' she said. 'I got ready to take a bow. 'It was no good,' she said. 'You'd better try again.' She was so right, too. Couldn't have been righter."

Parentetically, quite a few people below the implied eminence of Susan Zanuck are in Wagner's corner—and a few above it, such as Zanuck pere and the 20th Century-Fox Corporation as a whole. In fact, a sympathetic grip once begged a Wagner director to give Bob another shot at a scene he had not handled too well. The director, for some reason not yet explained, complied, with the result that Wagner showed amazing improvement.

Best wishes have also come from unexpected and rather dramatic quarters. Wagner's first conspicuous hit was as the delicate-fibred dreamer in What Price Glory?, and before the first day's shooting an extra detached himself from a group and gave Wagner a few unsolicited words of encouragement, explaining to him that the part could do a lot for him and expressing the hope that Wagner would then know what to do with success, if and when it came. The extra's feelings became clearer when he explained that his name was Barry Norton and that he had played the same role in the last previous version of the film, in support of Victor McLaglen and Edmund Lowe.

WAGNER was at once impressed and shaken by the incident. Later, when more and more stars of another decade shabbily turned up as members of background ensembles, he took grave note of the fragility of fame.

"There's no use fooling ourselves," he said over the second cup of coffee. "Today they seem to want me. Tomorrow—kaput. You were talking about marriage. I'd like maybe some day to have $100,000.

With that much, I'd feel free to take the risk. But I haven't got anything like it now. Right this moment, the way I feel is, I won't marry at least until I'm 30. Probably you shouldn't put that down because I know the way these things work, and as soon as a player says he will or won't do this or that, and one of the magazines prints it, he right away does the opposite and the magazine's left holding the bag. For all I know, I'll go clean off the dock for some girl a month from now, and I don't want MODERN SCREEN packing a knife with my name on it. But that's the way I feel now, today. And my father's given me a lot of the same advice, too. My father—there's somebody you ought to know. He's quite a guy."

THE time had inevitably come to press Junior on what he sought mainly in a wife, and here a man-sized snag was reached. Wagner took a deep breath and made indecisive motions with his hands. Finally he said in an oddly measured way: "There's one thing I know: The girl I marry has to want to be loved." He exhaled deeply. "Man, that's complicated, Recently Irene Dunne went to a pet shop at the Farmers' Market in search of a bird to be placed in the Beverly Hills Hotel, of which she is a part owner. Miss Dunne was fascinated by a talking parrot. She held a lengthy conversation with the bird. "This," she said to herself, "is just what is needed for the lobby of the hotel." Turning to the man behind the counter, who evidently owned the bird, Miss Dunne said that she'd like to buy the parrot.

"Sorry," said the man, "you see, he works in pictures. I'd have to check with his agent first."

isn't it? Let's try it again for size. What I mean is, she has to want very much that I be in love with her, do you see?"

Not, to be truthful, exactly.

"Well, look. I don't know—I don't know yet—whether I want to love or be loved. Maybe I don't even know what I mean by that, but somehow it seems important. It seems very important. I'm young, like I already said. I don't have to tell you. And all my values may change. Probably will. So the way I dope it now, maybe when you're young, you're more selfish, you want to receive more than give, and as an attitude, a way to go into marriage, that's not exactly copesetic, and maybe someone gets hurt. But as you get older—" He let his hands settle down and leaned back. "I give up. Come back to the set with me, will you?"

Julian signed the check.

The Wagner entourage walked south toward the foundering Titanic, which could be dipped any old way at the whim of the movie-makers. Wagner greeted a number of denim and T-shirt-clad huskies by their first names and got the same back. He greeted the chairman of the board with a deferential, "How do you do, Mr. Schenck," and got a vague if pleasant nod. He talked some more, with a mild note of idolatry creeping into his voice. The stars of Nearer My God To Thee are Barbara Stanwyck and Clifton Webb. They are two of the most proficient craftsmen in the business, and Wagner well knows it.

"You know, you get to thinking of your future wife, the girl you'll love some time, in terms of an older woman, the ones with that wonderful mature beauty, and I don't see how anyone could fail to settle for a person like Miss Stanwyck. She's kind, she thinks about you, she goes out of her way to help you, there seems to be nothing she wouldn't do. And as an actress—I'd just like to know, how good can you get?"

"She told me the other day, 'As soon as you're complacent, as soon as you're satisfied with where you are and what you've done—at that moment, you start slipping backward.' At my age, you can't buy advice like that. Either it's got to be given to you or you don't get it."

"I have scenes with both of them that I guess they could take over if they really wanted to. But all the ones that seem to be written for the character I play, they give to me—and sometimes, I think, a little more besides. It makes you stop believing the crummy things you hear once in a while about big stars. These two are really something."

After a while, Wagner leaped to the sloping deck of the ship and was told to make his way down to the lifeboat, now dangling over the side, hand over hand down the ropes suspended from the davits. He listened to the instructions hanging from the rope, supporting himself with one arm. It definitely was not a double, it was Wagner.

ODDLY, there is in the meteoric young Mr. Wagner no pronounced physical or personality characteristic on which a profelist can readily put his finger. Off-hand, he is slender, rather unremarkable youth who could be described as remotely suggesting Dick Haymes, if you wanted to take the easy way. In the commissary this day, he was more staring than stared at, and he became at one point as briskly interested as a visiting fireman when Susan Hayward crossed the room and disappeared in what may have been, but likely wasn't, the kitchen. His comment was a restrained snort.

Like many youngsters of the near-campus genre, he combs his hair forward, either with a comb or an eggbeater, and his voice is soft to the point of being guarded. For a fairly slight man, he's well-muscled upstairs, from waist to shoulders, and conceivably could pole-vault if he ever put his mind to it.

No one close to him thinks he's kidding in the slightest in his disavowals of marital intentions. There is not even a suspicion of a romantic interest. All that is, for the moment and in the Hollywood patois, for the birds.

Wagner, who a fan magazine recently decided was the second hottest bet for future stardom in Hollywood (Dale Robertson edged him out), could in a sense be described as born with a silver spoon which he subsequently removed from his mouth only to dip into ice cream—but that, as indicated, would be unfair.

He has, on the other hand, enjoyed from birth the degree of economic security that has spared him the neuroses that drive other actors to communism, sulphurous romantic entanglements, drink and eccentric conduct. If Wagner does in fact wind up with the girl next door or her prototype, they will have no difficulty understanding each other.

Wagner's associates and peers consider him an actor with genuine talent who is getting better all the time. There seems no reasonable doubt that his professional humility and willingness to learn are genuine, and so long as that continues he is in no immediate danger of taking a dive.

The startling degree of feminine adulation that has come his way has not moved him to any special extent—or if it has, he certainly is not inclined to discuss his reaction one way or another. In truth, no other intelligent course is open to an actor.

Until three days before our meeting, Wagner had a penchant both for hot rods and midget sport cars. That may be over now. "I piled up my MG Saturday," he said while walking toward the set. "Those babies skid a long way when they start to skid."

Water skiing, taught him by close friend Dan Dailey, is his preferred diversion, with riding, swimming and flying also rated by him worthwhile pastimes. Fox, however, is not renowned for encouraging its more expensive properties to pilot their own planes.

The muscles and athletic proclivities, incidentally, are not wholly gifts. Besides sharing the sportsmen's tastes of most young men brought up in Southern California, he's put in time in parental steel mills at Pittsburgh, Baltimore, Fort Wayne (Ind.) and South Lyon, Missouri. His father would have preferred he enter that business.

THAT was a preference evidently doomed from the start. Robert, by deposition of all who know him at all well, had both a mind of his own and a one-dimensional fix on motion pictures, going so far as to get a magazine subscription route in an area embracing the homes of many stars. He met only their maids and butlers but the pattern of the plan was forming.

His tour of caddy duty at the Bel-Air Country Club, an establishment occasionally frigid toward film colony memberships, didn't do him any harm, and did gain him the avuncular interest of Mr. Gable, who reminded him after he had signed with Fox:

"You know something? Anyone can be replaced."

Wagner's break, when it finally came, came like a great many others as a result of happenstance. He was singing informally, as vigorous young men will, in a small Beverly Hills restaurant. Agent Henry Wilson, also "scoffing" there, sent over his card and invited Wagner to stop in one of those days. Wagner did just that.

So here's the rundown on Bob:

He was something of a man-around-campus at Santa Monica High School, or enough so to be elected president of his senior class, and when he backed off stage there, he went quick like a bunny and enlisted in the Marine reserves.

The gyrenes may or may not have a place for him. He punctured an ear drum not long ago while water skiing, and not even the last persnickety army likes to buy those.

Wagner's idea of an extremely funny piece of business is to rehearse set dialogue with friends and then astound other friends by reciting it in unison without a break in timing. His idea of quiet fun is to build miniature trains, and his idea of serious food is steaks—but on paper plates, absolutely. Who wants to wash a dish?

He's a calisthenics man, particularly on arising, and a fair journeyman cook. He sleeps habitually in a crossdraft, which presumably will give him the croup sooner or later. And recently, when his father and mother moved to a new home in La Jolla, the scenic peninsula 100-plus miles south of Hollywood, he abandoned the old Beverly Hills home to set up light house-keeping in a bachelor apartment.

These days, Wagner is learning tap dancing—not as a lark, however, but back in the old fundamental attitude of what-you-do-know-can't-hurt-you. Miss Reynolds got him started, it's true, but it seems also there was going to be a part for a tap-dancer, or an actor who could tap dance, in an upcoming Fox picture titled There's No Business Like Show Business.

In short, our young man of many dates, no urge to marry, and spiralling prominence as a film player, is not a careless fellow. In the immemorial parting words of high school year books all over the land, including Santa Monica: "We are sure he will be a success."

she came a long way

(Continued from page 53) Hollywood?" For a moment it appeared as though the girl was going to get back into the plane, but with a shrug of her shoulders, intimating that she'd try anything once, she shuffled down the steps and Rosemary Clooney set foot for the first time on California soil.

Historically, this arrival may not rank with the landing in these parts of Cortez, but in the journals of the motion picture industry, it might well stack up one day with the first setting down on Hollywood ground of the Swedish brogans of Garbo, or the first toe-tap on our acreage of the nimble Fred Astaire. For they will tell you in Hollywood today that Rosemary Clooney will be a star of the first magnitude, one of the greats of our celluloid entertainment era; and Hollywood fully expects that she will be one of the big influences in driving the television-madened masses of the nation back into the movie houses.

Although she is only 24 it has been a hard and a long road to fame for Rosemary Clooney. Long because, like the fellow said, she started young—and hard, because she had to do most of the climbing herself and the helping hands were as scarce as wishbones on a turkey. Those who know her best doubt if Rosemary ever aspired to riches or adulation. All they know is that she wanted to be as good a singer as anyone else and she had a desire for some of the creature comforts, with maybe a mink coat some day to top it off. She worked for a living at her trade—which was singing songs—and kept an eye peeled for the next opportunity, which at times meant no more to her than a booking to pay the rent. She is where she is today because she had talent rather than avarice. That, the old-timers in Hollywood will tell you, is better than having an uncle who plays checkers with Louis B. Mayer.

ROSEMARY Clooney was born in Maysville, Kentucky, on May 3, 1928. She came from an ancestry that lived in Ireland until one of them put down his peat-spade, spat on his hands and started trudging toward a boat that could take him to America where a man could get something to eat besides a potato. Some prospered and some longed for a return to the peace of the bogs and cursed their adventurous grandfather. None captured renown, although Rosemary's grandfather did become Kentucky-famous as the long-time Mayor of Maysville. It was His Worship, by the way, who was probably responsible for Rosemary becoming a singer.

Because they were reared during the depression, Rosemary Clooney and her sister Bettie, and her infant brother, Dick, had a childhood that was a notch or so less lavish than the Rockefeller kids. Andy Clooney, their dad, was a house painter, and although a danged deft man with a brush and a bucket of lead and oil, not too canny about estimating a profit into a contract. Rosemary's girlhood was not crammed with candle-light suppers for her girl friends, frothy new frocks, or even real butter on the table. Andy was strictly a provider, as were most honest men of his time. Providing came hard, and often the cupboard was bitterly bare; but there was love in the family—and fun.

A good deal of the fun Rosemary and Bettie Clooney enjoyed during their childhood came from campaigning for Grandad. It was their pleasure to provide the entertainment for his political rallies. They would step atop the wooden platforms before the old boy's speeches and hack away at the crowd's morale with renditions of such prideful tunes as "My Old Kentucky Home" and "She'll Be Comin' Round The Mountain." Like a pair of skinny captive pigeons, bug-eyed and nervous, they stumped Maysville incessantly, wailing their slender repertoire, and proving to the constituents that Hizzonor was the tool of no powerful special interests, else he'd have had the Andrews Sisters.

It was thus that Rosemary Clooney started to sing. Milk in those days was selling at the alarming price of nine cents a quart and Andy Clooney often got no more than four dollars for painting a kitchen, so vocal lessons for Rosey and Bettie were out of the question. They did, however, manage to study harmony. Grandad was a fan of negro spiritual music and would take the girls to the negro churches in Maysville to listen and worship. While the choir was at work, Rosemary and her sister would sit quietly with their heads together and softly croon the hymns in harmony.

When Rosemary was 13 years old, Andy Clooney moved the family to Cincinnati. By this time the sisters were sure they were ready to earn a dollar, so they brazenly presented themselves to the management of radio station WLW where, to their astonishment, they were employed at a very nominal fee. But they were on their way.

THE change-over years from little girlhood to shaky adolescence were spent in an atmosphere of perilous hope. Sometimes there was sufficient of everything to go around—and at others there was just hope. But they were young and they demanded little more of life than a fair swat at a chance, so it was a happy childhood for Rosemary and Bettie. You can see that today in the smiles they wear and you can hear it in their laughter. They had become pretty famous locally and very popular. WLW was their home and something of a permanent place of employment.

Rosemary was 18 and Bettie was 15 when Tony Pastor's orchestra came to Cincinnati and Pastor heard them on the radio. He had been looking for a vocalist, so he had his manager, a chap named Charles Trotta, go over and audition them. Trotta no doubt had in mind picking one of the girls, but he was so enchanted by their songs and antics as a team that he hired them both. Because they were minors, an uncle, George Gilfoyle, was pressed into service as a guardian—and the Clooney girls set out on the road to learn about the world beyond the fields of blue grass; and to charm the foreigners of the North and the East and the West just as they had Grandpa's voters.

You hear one story about a singer travelling with a band and you've heard them all. It's a staggering series of night bus rides, sleeping to the back-rap of the motors and the whip of wheels on pavement. It's an endless chain of dance halls with old dressing rooms and shaky ironing boards on which to press the uniform of the vocalist, the ever-wrinkled satin evening gown. It's boredom and hello and goodbye so fast you feel that life is moving faster than it has a right to. It's new towns that are all the same, new people who are always telling you to hurry up; and every night oceans of men and women bobbing about before you like lunatic puppets, not to music so much as to arrangements. And the band singer soon knows that she lives in a strange carousel world where the only pay-off is to stand in a spotlight and sing for her reward, the applause that follows her once in a while as she walks back to her chair to wait for her next turn to sing. It's rough—but if you want to be a singer or an actress there's no better school.

It was just about four years ago that Rosemary Clooney decided she ought to graduate. It was a big decision for her because no one had come forward and announced that he had "discovered" her. This meant that she would have to start cold as a single act. Bettie elected to stick with bands, so the team broke up. Rosie found a friend and advisor in Joe Shribman, Charlie Trotta's partner. Joe was even more enthusiastic about the move than Rosemary was. He said that he would personally get her launched in the big time and promised that she at least wouldn't starve to death in New York that winter.

There began a slow process of evolution. Shribman arranged for a small contract with Columbia Records. Rosemary made such platters as "The Kid's A Dreamer" and "I Only Saw Him Once," disks that soon became the talk of the record-collecting set but didn't make a dent in the security of the singing gals on top of the heap. She made kiddie records and became quite a smash with the young ones, but you can't get rich catering to buyers who have to shout out the old man out of half a buck to make a purchase.

You'd be bewitched, bemused and beamazed at: Mike Romanoff's cufflinks of gold, enormous imperial crowns . . . Mrs. Louis B. Mayer's six-foot-tall camellia bushes in tubs on her front porch, encrusted with unbelievable pink flowers, quite breath-taking . . . Hopalong Cassidy's car—a snowball-white Cadillac upholstered in black and white zebra skins . . . Betty Grable's fan mail. Still No. 1 star for eight straight years, she still gets letters reading: "What is the cubic content of your legs? . . . Will you please send me a plaster paris cast of your legs?" . . . The long two-headed pipe from Italy smoked by half-pint extrovert Mickey Rooney.

*Austine in

Rosemary Clooney's first sizable contribution to modern music sales was with an oldie called "Beautiful Brown Eyes." Even today people ask for it at music counters, but it came hard on the heels of another release by the better established Patty Paige—a wail called "The Tennessee Waltz"—and failed to make Rosemary a star. The song did, however, attract the attention of Mitch Miller, the man who picks the records for Columbia, and he set about finding a tune that would put Rosemary up where she belonged. When he found it Clooney thought he had lost his balance. It was an idiotic chant written by a couple of Armenian amateurs, Ross Bagdasarian and his novel-writing cousin, William Saroyan.

ROSEMARY will frankly admit when anyone asks her, that she most certainly did not want to record "Come On-a My House." As far as she was concerned, it was something a Turk would shout down a well if he was drunk—and definitely nothing that a nice-looking young man with 79 cents would take home and cry himself to sleep with. And the music was all wrong. Instead of lots of fiddles and muted French horns, Miller had a plan to back her voice up with a harpsichord, played to sound like a piano, made from a packing case and baling wire. She said no; she said maybe; and then, possibly because the snow was beginning to fall and Manhattan looked frightfully cruel to a Kentucky-bred gal so she said yes.

Well, it was a knee-slapper, a barn-burner! Normally sane people began humming it in subways. Debutantes requested string quartettes to try it at musicales. The nation began jabbering in dialect—and Rosemary Clooney was swept up on a wave of popularity the like of which the music world has seldom seen. Theaters that once offered her $200 a week tried to book her at $4,000. Television producers who just a short time before asked her to come to their shows for the experience and a case of shaving cream asked her to stop by and make out her own check. It was almost worth all that bus riding.

Even though she was a hit on records, and her subsequent platters began selling like candy-apples at a county fair, Rosemary Clooney never thought about motion pictures. Although she has a figure that would make a male tear his eyes away from a winning hand in a poker game, and a face that would win the heart of the King of the Leprechauns, she has always considered herself plain. When her friends told her differently and spoke of Hollywood, Rosemary would lift her upper lip and expose a single tooth that had gotten out of hand and pointed east instead of south. "That spoils my face," she would chortle. And then she'd chuckle, "But they can't see it on records!"

But Hollywood had to come. After a day or so of Columbia sales meetings on her first trip to Hollywood, she went to Las Vegas and played a date at the Thunderbird Hotel. On the opening night, a quiet bronzed little fellow came back stage and introduced himself as Milton Lewis, talent scout for Paramount Pictures. He asked if Rosemary was interested in the movies. Rosie tapped the tooth, but Lewis wouldn't go away. He made her promise that when she came to Hollywood again she would let him make a test. Still tapping the tooth as a warning, Rosemary promised.

This writer happened to be in the projection room when the test was shown to Rosemary and studio executives. The scene was a stock thing, dull and casually directed; and then there was a chorus of "Come On-a My House." When the lights went up there was a thrill of expectancy in the room. Movie-makers seldom give an opinion before asking one of somebody else, but this time everyone in the room wanted to be put down on the record as stating that Rosemary Clooney was going to be a star. You could sense that they all wanted to rush back to their offices and get a contract drawn up. Rosemary was the calmest. I guess she figured Hollywood was just another town on the circuit.

ALL you have to do is take a look at Rosemary Clooney in repose and you'll know she believes in Lady Luck. She would have done all right in pictures without a break, but when her second big break came, she knew it was Luck—and accepted it from the fickle wench. She had just finished making The Stars Are Singing, her first movie, when Betty Hutton tore up her contract and walked off the Paramount lot. Suddenly the studio heads looked around and discovered they didn't have a girl under contract who could sing and dance and get away with making make-believe love to a leading man. No one, that is, except Clooney. Well, sir, Damon was never half as considerate of Pythias as that front office became of Rosemary. She was not only talented and lovely—they needed her. She had to go out of town to do some club dates, and Paramount followed her with letters and telegrams telling of the wonderful plans they had for her. It's all part of the business, but they could have spared the expense. By this time Rosemary liked the work. And she'd had that tooth fixed.

Romantically, Rosemary Clooney is riding a tiger. Her romance with Jose Ferrer has been much publicized, although it hardly had time to do much more than kindle before they were separated by their work. It has been said, by both of them, that Ferrer was to divorce his wife and marry Rosemary, and those close to her expect that this will happen eventually. It might be true, because they respect one another both as artists and people.

SOcially, Rosemary Clooney has a small clique of friends to whom she is devoted. They include Joe Shribman, her manager, Jackie Sherman, her best friend, confidante and travelling companion and one or two others. Beyond this small group the world is made up of nice people—but there are so many of them and so little time to get to know them all well enough to be able to call them by their first names. It's a far piece, as they say in Kentucky, from Maysville. But Rosemary remembers it—and Maysville remembers her. They named a street after her down there last year. Bettie Clooney is doing all right and Rosemary expects she'll be on top, too, one day soon. And Andy Clooney's the proudest painter (house, that is) in the South. And once in a while Rosemary puts down the book she's reading and stares off into space and thinks of Grandpa, and the elections, and the Negro churches, and the spirituals that taught her to sing, and WLW, and the back rap of the bus motors, and the oceans of bobbing heads, and the ironing boards, and cold, hungry New York and that crooked tooth. Then she goes upstairs and gets her mink out of the closet and blows on it to see if it's real. Sometimes she's almost sure it is. END

Fred has earned considerable respect from those in his profession. He is basically a pianist and composer, and will undoubtedly one day head an entire music department. Although he, too, was married before, he had been divorced almost six years at the time he and Jane fell in love. He lived in his own home with his mother and 11-year-old daughter, Terry.

IN his position at Columbia he presented a fair target for the distaff side of the industry's roster. Good-looking, intelligent and eligible, he was exposed to some of the most glamorous names in the business, but if any of the actresses evinced interest in Mr. Karger, he failed to return the compliment. Quiet, soft-spoken and even-tempered, he went about his job in an impersonal manner, pleasant with everyone and winning the respect of all his associates. Employees at the studio affectionately call him Freddie, and none of them can recall ever seeing him irritated or upset about anything. They'll tell you that the immediate impression he makes is one of quiet strength.

Jane Wyman reacted the same way that first day she walked into his office. She had seen him around town many times, chiefly in connection with his orchestra. Karger had organized the band some years ago for the purpose of playing at a few select parties. These were mostly society shindigs, many of them given by staid Pasadena citizens. The band was also on hand for the more elegant Hollywood parties, including Marian Davies' recent soiree, as well as gala evenings at the tennis club in Palm Springs. While Jane's recent movie roles have depicted her as dowdy, decrepit or a deaf-mute, she has not changed in her personal life. She is now, as always, a gay and amusing girl, and is famous for the fact that, at parties, she can't resist belting a ballad or two for the assembled guests. Because of this penchant for warbling whenever an occasion presents itself, she sang a few times with Fred's band. It was always a briefly casual sort of thing; when guests demanded she sing Jane would go up to the podium and say, "Hi, Freddie," and suggest a song—maybe

"My Man" or "Somebody Loves Me."

Jane reported for work at Columbia almost two months before the start of the movie, as is customary with musicals. The song and dance routines are mapped out far in advance of the actual shooting. It was then that she and Fred really came to know each other for the first time, and it's paradoxical that columnists had heard wedding bells every time Jane had so much as spoken with a man, yet now, with love in bloom, no one had an inkling. If they dated, Hollywood didn't know about it. They frequently dined together after work, but rather than one of the brighter spots in town they chose a small Italian restaurant across the street from the studio. Anyone seeing them there would suppose it a natural result of their work together in preparation for the movie.

After two months of such daily contact, Fred popped the question, but neither he nor Jane will tell the press the details of the proposal. As we said before, Jane kept the wedding a secret until the last minute, and even now is insisting on her privilege of keeping the more treasured moments for herself.

Director Richard Quine, one of Fred's closest friends, was one of the few people admitted to the secret circle, and it was he who made all the arrangements for the wedding. Both Jane and Fred were working 12 hours a day on the picture, and had literally not one minute free to attend to details.

Dick earned his position as the best man at the wedding. First he phoned the County Clerk up in Santa Barbara, which is one of the few towns that will hold a clerk after working hours, asking them to issue a license. He also engaged a minister to be prepared to marry a young couple on Saturday night, November 1st. Dick did not say what couple; for obvious reasons he gave fictitious names. He also ordered a wedding cake, to be taken to Santa Barbara on Saturday night.

MEANWHILE, Louella Parsons caught wind somehow of the impending wedding, and on Friday telephoned Jane to ask if it was true. After Jane admitted it was, Louella's Saturday morning column carried the news of the betrothal, omitting details. The wire services were hysterical that day. It is their job to be there when news happens, but although they called everyone they could think of, no one could tell them when or where Jane was to become Mrs. Karger. While the AP and UP were running up their telephone bills, Jane and Fred were working as usual, at Columbia. They left the studio a few minutes before six o'clock in the evening, and equipped with nothing except two wedding rings, joined Dick Quine and his wife, and the wedding cake for the drive to Santa Barbara. By this time the children had been told about the wedding plans, and also Betty Lou Fredericks, Jane's hairdresser and close friend. It was necessary for Betty Lou to know because she was to be Jane's attendant, and after she squeezed into the car they were off.

At Santa Barbara the amazed clerk recognized Jane and issued a marriage license. The minister was even more surprised. Not ten minutes before the wedding party showed up he had been telephoned by one of the wire services. "Was he planning to marry Jane Wyman to F. Karger?" "Indeed not," said the minister, and when minutes later he saw Miss Wyman walk in, the episcopal conscience began working overtime.

THEY were married in a brief and simple service after which the five of them celebrated at a sumptuous dinner, topped off with the wedding cake. And then, not a reporter nor a camera having showed up, they went to the San Ysidro Hotel for the night.

The next day, Sunday, they had breakfast and returned to Hollywood. At Jane's home they found the trio of children who will live with them; Fred's daughter Terry and Jane's daughter Maureen, as well as her son Mike. The two girls are approximately the same age and became fast friends during the courtship of their respective parents. They had spent the morning gathering flowers and digging through the record repertoire until they came up with some appropriate wedding music. So when Fred and Jane walked arm-in-arm through the front door, they were greeted by Lohengrin and banks of flowers all over the house.

That night they gave a dinner party attended by Louella Parsons, songwriter Jimmy McHugh, and Mr. and Mrs. Dick Quine. The next morning when Jane reported for work the cast and crew sang "Here Comes The Bride," and at the end of the day they gave a party for the newlyweds. There was a second wedding cake, and as one wag put it, "wine, Wyman and song." The gang was so happy about the whole thing that one of them had sneaked off the lot during the day and with hastily gathered contributions had bought a wedding gift, a huge box filled with table linens.

FRED's mother continues to live in his house in the valley, and Jane and Fred set up housekeeping in her own home. The house at the time was being redecorated with an eye to selling it, which Jane planned to do weeks before she and Fred knew each other. It was a handy happenstance, as now they can buy, together, the home they want. Until that time, they necessarily are living with a crew of painters who, as usual, seem to take their time about getting the job done.

They agree that their new home must be of the informal type, when their musical's finished, there will be time to hunt for a house. At this writing there is a problem of space, for not only will they house three children, but also three pianos. Jane already had one, and Fred two, and much as they both love music, they agree three pianos is a lot for one home.

Music is their one great love in common; their sense of humor the other. Three months is a brief time to become acquainted, at least for such a serious step as marriage. But neither Fred nor Jane take marriage lightly, and they already know the most important things—that they love and respect each other, and that their children get along like three peas in a pod. Other facts are relatively unimportant, and besides, they'll have fun finding out about them. END make me honest

(Continued from page 40) thought of you and how I talked to you the other day about movie stars not telling everything to writers. And about how you said that you'd tell a writer anything he wanted to know—and didn't give a hang about what he printed as long as it was the truth. That's when you got me into a peak of trouble.

"How would you like," I said, "to have the real low-down on Jane Russell."

"What's the matter, is she getting a divorce?" the editor said eagerly.

"Certainly not!" I retorted indignantly.

"She going to have a baby?" he said.

"She sick? She quitting the movies? She in love with Farley Granger?"

"None of those things," I said, getting hot under the collar.

"Then what other kind of low-down is there?" he said narrowly.

"There is plenty more low-down than that run-of-the-mill stuff," I said. "The trouble with guys like you is that you have lost the common touch. It just so happens that I am very close to Jane Russell, and she is anxious to tell me all her thoughts and secrets and have me put them down on paper. Now do you want or not?"

"Well," he said, "maybe you got something there. You go on home and write me that sort of thing about Jane Russell and maybe we won't have to replace you around here this month."

Now do you see the fix I'm in? You've got to help me out. You've got to let me put down the truth about you, just what kind of a woman you really are. The things you like to do for fun—and the kind of work you want to do. I'll give you an idea here of what I have in mind, and you read it and answer this letter right away so I can go to work on it.

In the first place, I want to begin with the subject that always makes your lip curl. I want to state that you are a little weary of being known as the girl who did more for the sweater than Gary Cooper did for the horse. I once heard a fellow murmur as you passed, "Man, there goes a ball of yarn that made good!" And I'd like to tell how, if you had heard him, you'd have kicked him in the stomach. I would just like to establish that you are sick of the whole chest bit—and then drop it. Maybe we can even get them to run a picture of you in an overcoat, which would be something of a novelty.

THEN I would like to take up the matter of your career. I want to say, Jane, that you descended on the movie industry like a comet, when Howard Hughes first startled everybody with The Outlaw. Now anybody who has seen an Outlaw billboard has the impression that it's a sex movie, in which a guy chases a girl over hill and dale and finally tags her in a hay barn. However, those who have seen the movie know this is not true. It has been considered by quite a number of top critics as a milestone in motion picture-making, and you, yourself, were credited with bringing a completely new characterization to the screen. When people in this country saw an Outlaw billboard they generally cried: "Woweeeee!" That was the only comment. And yet in England, where it made a lot of money, it was known as a children's picture, billed that way as a matter of fact.

I would like to quote you as saying that it has been great, that you are very grateful for the opportunity of being the "Woweeeee!" girl, but you'd like to have them knock it off. I would like to tell them that you're getting so sick of being the girl who looks at a man through slits of eyes and silently dares him to come and get it, that you might scream any day now. And tell them that you're sick of producers who keep doing switches on the hay barn by making it fancy boudoirs or mountain cabins, because all the time, they, you and the audience know it's really the hay barn.

When we talked, you seemed a little bitter about not getting to do a different kind of role. Let me say that. Let me tell them that you're tired of playing Jane Russell, that you'd like to have a chance to prove you can act. I know that might sound kind of stilted, because almost everybody in this town, when they are being interviewed, says they'd like to reaaaally act. But with you it's different. I'd like to point out that you've been an actress for more years than most of the stars in this town, and that you've learned your trade well. That you know your business and want a chance to prove it.

I would like to point out, Jane, that you have a right to these things because right now, with salaries way down, you are one of the very highest paid stars in Hollywood. Studios pay $200,000 a picture for your name and services. Maybe you don't get all that money, but the point is it is paid and there are lots of takers waiting in line to get you.

Another thing I'd like to point out is your loyalty. I don't want to get sticky about it, but loyalty to friends and the people who gave an actress her start is pretty rare in Hollywood. I read a quote from you in a column the other day and you said of Howard Hughes, to whom you've always been under contract, "I want to sign another contract with him, because when somebody puts you on the right track, you like him to be there when the train comes in." The way it generally happens is that a producer plucks a girl from behind a hat rack, makes her rich and famous, and then, when their original deal has expired, he can't even get her unlisted telephone number. And I'd like to point out that the loyalty is mutual, because when Hughes sold RKO the only thing he wanted to keep was your contract.

Another thing I'd like to straighten out is the religion thing. Every time any one mentions the chapel you and your friends built for your mother, somebody is sure to say: "You mean this kid goes to church?" Maybe it is because of the movie ads that always have you looking like a fallen woman. Maybe it's just that people can't get used to a sexy movie actress having a private life that includes a faith. Even Hollywood doesn't understand about you and religion. Recently I heard an actor say: "I don't know what kind of a religion that is, but I was near the chapel when they were all in there the other day and they were laughing and hollering like it was a weenie-bake." I'd like to try and explain that it was like a weenie-bake. That you and your friends worship with joy; that you don't feel sorrow is necessary to express love of God. And that during the services, which are conducted by your mother, those privileged to be present are encouraged to be themselves—and to consider the meeting as much pleasure as a party.

All sorts of stories are gotten around about you and that chapel. Some people say you are irrelevant. Some that it is a scandal the way you all talk back to your mother, who is sort of pastor. But in all the history of Hollywood no other star, to my knowledge, has ever built his own church. That speaks for itself. It is your church, your own private place of worship, and it is truly a house where love of God is ever present.

I THINK something ought to be said about your home life. Actually, maybe I ought to dramatize that a bit, because it is altogether too folksy around your shack. Nobody is going to believe, for instance, that you seldom have movie stars over or that you don't throw fancy wing-dings regularly like the other stars do. If I were to tell them that most of your friends are in other, unglamorous lines of work they might not believe me. Who would believe that some of your best friends drive trucks and run gas stations? And who would believe that your husband couldn't tell a camera boom from a whiffle-tree?

Maybe we ought to jazz up this part of the story and say that he is not particularly interested in football, but plans to go to Italy and make a series of pictures with you and Rossellini. That would be better than trying to make people believe that he's just a quiet quarterback with next Sunday's game on his mind most of the time—and he doesn't want any chattering around the house about the movies when he's thinking. And I'd better not mention that as far as he is concerned, he'd just as soon you were a housewife and didn't go trotting off in the mornings to have a lot of silly pictures taken.

There's one thing for sure. You've got to let me tell them that the picture you're making right now, Gentlemen Prefer Blondes, is definitely going to be a turning point in your career for a number of reasons. One of them is that it will probably be the last movie you'll make on your original contract with Howard Hughes, and while you are willing to negotiate a new one with the man, things are going to have to be different. If anyone wants to see the old Jane Russell after this, they'll have to go to neighborhood theaters and see old pictures. Because from now on you're going to have a say in the story, the director and the way you play a role.

You know, I think this is a very good thing. I took a small poll of the people who know you personally and have seen your movies and not one of them said they had ever seen your true personality in a movie. Now that's a crock of cider! Please believe me that it is not idle flattery when I tell you that if you ever came across on film the way you do in a living room, Hughes could get $400,000 for you. There is just that much difference. Instead of luring men on with a curled lip they ought to let you grin at a guy, and slip him a wink. I've seen you do it—and it's sexier than the snaky wenching they've got you doing now. If they want the sort of thing they've been paying you for, let them revive Theda Bara.

Let them stop making you play Jane Russell the Wanton and give you a chance to play Jane Russell the quarterback's old lady. The fans will go wild. Nobody in this town is more beautiful than you when you smile—and nobody has a better wit or a heartier laugh. Use these things, girl, the way the Lord intended you to. Don't give up sweaters and low necklines and slit skirts entirely. I'd hate to be known as the guy who talked you into that. But give it a dash of some of the real you.

I suppose I'm pretty bold suggesting these things, but I gathered from your conversation the last time we talked that you're ready for it. I remember asking you that stock question: "How does it feel to be the reigning sex queen—working with a girl (Marilyn Monroe) who is challenging you?" And you laughed and said, "She can have it. She'll find out." I sort of felt that you were anxious for the kid to steal the crown while you were out to lunch.

You said something about not wanting to talk about kids, but I don't see how I am going to be able to give a well-rounded picture of you without mentioning them. I don't have to tell you that you are known in some circles as The Great Adopter. I suppose it is because of all that publicity you got in London last year when you adopted that Irish baby—and half the poor mothers in England who wanted to see their tots have a better chance at life than they could give them came to your door carrying babies for you to bring to America to raise as your own. You have your own reasons for not wanting to talk about this, but I think you should.

I believe, Jane, that it is a part of your character, this wanting to have a baby in the house all the time. You are a mother more than any woman I've ever known. I'll admit this is a little incongruous to some people, because you certainly don't look like somebody's ma. But it is true, so let's tell. When you go to court next month to legalize the adoption of your son, Thomas, I think you should pose for all the photographers willingly. It might inspire other people to follow your example and give homes to kids who might otherwise never have them.

Now what can we do about this Gentlemen Prefer Blondes? You know this is actually something different for you. I mean with all this singing and dancing and such. I was over on the dance rehearsal stage the other day and saw you learning one of the numbers. I didn't think I was looking at Eleanor Powell, but I must say that you can kick up a heel with a lot of the best of them. And along with Niagara Falls, a sunset I once shared with a girl, and Hollywood at night from the air, I must include the picture of you and Marilyn Monroe dancing together in tights and long black stockings as one of the prettiest sights I have ever seen.

AND while we're on the subject of Monroe, I have to pay you another compliment. You are so good to this girl. Generally when a big star works with another who might get a bit more or better footage, it's like a duel without swords. Slick grins at 20 paces. But you have taken Marilyn under your wing like a mama gooney bird. And she is grateful. It is so unusual to see such a friendship grow on a movie set. However, these things pay off themselves. You don't need me to pat you on the head for it.

Now there are just one or two other things and I think we will have it all.

I would like to point out, for instance, that there has never been a breath of scandal in Hollywood about you or your husband, Bob Waterfield. And after about ten years of marriage, I think this is something of a record, particularly because you are Jane Russell. Even the worst of the gossippers don't expect to hear talk about somebody like Spring Byington, but about almost everybody else they do.

Bob is a handsome lad who travels about a good deal. It just stands to reason that somewhere along the line attractive dolls have tried to crash into his room and snatch his football helmet. But there has never been a whisper about him, either. I guess you are very much alike. The word was, last year, if I am permitted to mention Las Vegas, that you had a mild scuffle and he whacked you in the eye. I don't know whether he did or not, but if he did, I think that most men figured it's a man's privilege to stun his wife once in a while—and they have nothing but admiration for a good woman who will put a piece of steak on the mouse and go home like a good girl. Let's put that in the story. Kind of makes you like the rest of us.

Well, this letter has been longer than I thought it would be. If there is anything else I should write about you I'll have to think of it later. What I've put down here seems to fill the bill.

As I mentioned at the beginning, I need your cooperation in this matter, because if you hadn't told me that you wanted to be pictured as you really are I would never have got into this fix.

Sometime later, maybe in about a year or so, I would like to talk to you again and see just how many of the things you have planned have taken place. I'd like to bet you right now that there will be a new Jane Russell in pictures—and you'll have given a better performance on the screen than you ever did on a billboard. I'd like to bet, too, that there will be another baby in your home and another one being looked for. I have no advance information, I'm just sure that you'll build a big family to have around when the day comes that Russell hangs up her evening gowns.

Please answer me promptly. And please let me say all the things you've told me before. As the editor pointed out to me awhile ago, the graduating class of the Harvard School of Journalism is due here in a few weeks, their noodles grinding like crazy. I ask for no sympathy, but I would like to point out that I, too, am an orphan.

it's a girl

(Continued from page 24) feeling of nausea swept over her. "I don't feel good," she thought. Geary was still sleeping. She called to him. "Honey! Wake up, dear! I feel sort of—well, you know. Not too good."

Geary jumped out of bed. "Do you want me to call the doctor? The hospital? Do you want me to get something for you?"

Janie laughed. "Stop it, darling. You're so funny. I'm not going to have the baby until the eighth of December. Don't you remember?"

"I know, but if you don't feel good, we'd still better call the doctor."

"All right, Geary. Call him. But let's wait a little while. I'll stay in bed a bit longer."

"That's a good idea, darling. You'll feel better. And I'll get ready to go to work." Geary headed for the shower.

Janie could hear her handsome husband moving about the bathroom quietly. She began to feel better. Wasn't she a lucky girl! She was thinking about her wonderful life. She breathed a silent prayer. "Dear God. Thank you for all the goodness you have shown me. Thank you for a devoted husband and a fine, beautiful baby boy and the promise of another baby soon." (Geary Steffen III is just 16 months old.)

Geary prepared breakfast. But Jane couldn't enjoy bacon and eggs, toast and coffee. "Thanks, dear, but I just don't feel like eating."

It was nine o'clock when Geary called Doctor Blake Watson. "Jane felt a bit under the weather when she awoke this morning."

"Drop by the hospital with her about 11 o'clock. Dr. Watson liked the Steffens. He considered that they were a mighty well-adjusted young couple. He always enjoyed seeing them. He would be looking forward to their appointment later in the morning."

Jane and Geary were on time. It wasn't quite 11 when they reached St. John's Hospital in Santa Monica.

Dr. Watson was pleased. "Well, you're both looking fine. We'll take you to the X-ray room, Jane. And, as for Geary, I'd say that he doesn't need any attention at all."

After the examination, Dr. Watson held a small conference with the Steffens. "Now, I want Jane to get a lot of rest. It's possible that the baby might be a little early. That being the case, we must be more careful from now on."

"I'm glad I'm going to have it early. As a matter of fact, the sooner it happens, the better I'll like it."

Dr. Watson smiled. "Have it as soon as you like—but there's one thing I want you to promise." His smile widened. "Don't have the baby on Saturday. I have two 96 tickets for the UCLA-USC game. And they're right on the 50-yard, line too."

Jane and Geary laughed. Then Jane solemnly promised not to ruin the doctor's enjoyment of the big game.

They spent a little time with Sister John Marie, the obstetrical supervisor. Then they went home.

OVER Geary's remonstrances, Jane prepared lunch. "After all, Geary, you have a business appointment—and besides, you made breakfast this morning while I was being lazy."

After eating, Geary kissed his wife. "Darling, you're the most wonderful thing that could ever have happened to a man. Now, I'm going to run along, but I'll be back early. Don't work too hard with Earl this afternoon."

It was late in the afternoon before Jane had completed her work with song writer and coach, Earl Brent. They had spent several hours practicing songs Jane is preparing for her forthcoming appearance at Copa City in Florida sometime in February.

Earl was just getting ready to leave when Geary returned. He said, "Geary, I've never seen a girl like Jane before. I'm practically worn out, and she's still ready to sing another song. I tried to get her to take it easy, but she wants everything to be perfect for her engagement in Florida."

Janie explained, "Well, it's going to be my first big appearance in a long time, and I guess I'm just a bit excited."

Geary said, "Earl, why don't you join us for dinner this evening? We're taking my mother with us, and then afterwards, the Durneys are meeting us. We're going to see Jose Greco at the Wilshire-Ebell."

"Well, that sounds like a good idea. Then Jane and I can do a little more talking about Copa City."

Dinner was wonderful at Chasen's. Janie hadn't felt better in a long time. She ate a huge shrimp cocktail, caesar salad, large sirloin steak. "But this isn't enough for a big girl like me," she laughed. "Earl, let me have a little of your Chicken Tetrazzini."

Janie still wasn't satiated. "That was a pretty good sample. Geary, darling, I'll bet you won't be able to finish your roast beef. Do you want me to help you?"

Geary proposed a toast. "To Janie and the baby we'll soon have."

"And now, I'd like to have a little dessert," continued his wife.

The "little dessert" was a Snowball . . . huge ball of ice cream covered with coconut and chocolate syrup.

The happy group was still talking in hushed admiration of Janie's appetite, when Dorothy and Richard Durney walked in.

"Come on, we're all ready to go—and it's not much after eight," urged Geary.

Earl said, "I know you'll have a marvelous evening. Sorry I can't join you, but there's more work for me to do. You're lucky, Janie. You can loaf now. Have fun."

Jane, Geary, Mrs. Steffen, Dorothy and Richard Durney took their seats at the Wilshire-Ebell just as the curtain began to rise. The pulsating music of Spain filled the air.

Janie sat forward in her seat. Her lips parted, and she lost herself in the electrifying excitement of the color and sound of Jose Greco's dynamic presentation. Her heart beat faster. She could almost see herself dancing with the group of talented performers. Music bubbled through her mind. Then she began to feel a rush of warmth—an uncomfortable warmth. She felt dizzy. The dancers swirled faster and faster. She sat back and closed her eyes.

Geary looked at her. "Is there something wrong?"

"Oh, no, dear. I feel just fine."

She smiled, but Geary thought it looked a little weak. He watched her as the curtain came down on the first act. She seemed to be all right again.

IN the middle of the second act, Janie touched Geary's arm. "Honey, I feel terribly warm. Maybe I'd better go out for a glass of water."

Geary was worried. "Come on, dear, I'll take you out."

In the lobby, Geary took a glass of water to her, and after a few minutes, Janie said, "I think I'd like to see the rest of the show."

The performance ended with tumultuous applause. As Jane rose, she felt a wave of dizziness again. "Geary, I don't feel well. Get in the car. Please hurry!"

Dorothy Durney spoke up. "Yes, Geary, hurry! I think we should go to the hospital immediately. Dick, you call the doctor and tell him to meet us at the hospital."

The car was two blocks away, but Geary ran every step. He was still breathless when he wheeled the car to a quick stop in front of the theatre. Two of their friends, Ricardo and Georgiana Montalban, had witnessed the flurry of activity. Ricky was excited. "Are you going to the hospital?"

Geary had just time to say, "You bet," before he pointed the car toward Santa Monica.

Geary drove very carefully. It was almost 11:30 P.M. By the time they reached St. John's Hospital, Janie was once again in high spirits.

"Gee, I'll bet I scared you—and without a good reason, either. Just imagine. Getting Dr. Watson to meet us this time of night," Janie giggled. "He'll probably laugh at me and tell me to drop back some time next month."

Just before midnight, Dr. Watson met a smiling, happy group at the hospital.

Janie explained what had happened. "But I don't think we should really have bothered you at all tonight."

"Well, as long as you're here, we might as well examine you."

About 20 minutes later, Dr. Watson returned to talk to Geary. "Janie's a little farther along than we had figured, but she's not ready for the big event. Why don't you all wait here, and I'll go back to her."

Dorothy Durney said, "Geary, I'll bet it won't be long at all."

Geary laughed. "Oh no, Dorothy, she won't have the baby for days."

A few minutes later—it was just about 1:15 AM—a nurse walked past, pushing an incubation cart with a new-born infant.

Dorothy pointed. "I'll bet that's your baby, Geary!"

Geary looked at the cart. "It can't be."

A minute or two later, he saw another nurse. He walked toward her. "Nurse! Nurse! What's happening?"

The nurse brushed past. She was in a hurry. And she didn't answer.

Just then, Geary saw Dr. Watson. He ran to him. "What's going on, doctor?"

It was dark in the hall. For a second, Dr. Watson didn't recognize Geary. Then he smiled. He put out his hand and clasped Geary's strongly. "Congratulations, my boy! You and Janie are parents of a beautiful, healthy baby girl! And Janie's just fine."

That was when the exulting male voice had shouted, "It's a girl. It's a Girl!"

"Yes, that's the way it has happened," he thought. He ran the rest of the way down the hall. He hugged his mother, Dorothy and Dick, too.

Suddenly, a strange thought struck Geary. "Hey, look. This isn't the way it's supposed to happen. I didn't even have a chance to worry. What good is a father—if he can't spend hours pacing the floor and grinding out countless cigarettes. I should have undergone torture—rivulets of perspiration should have coursed down my face. I should have been almost out on my feet when the doctor told me the news. But no! I feel wonderful!" Then he burst out laughing. "Now I can tell a secret. Janie and I wanted a girl. But we didn't say a word about it. Isn't it wonderful?"

"Come on, we'll go to the nursery. I'm sure they'll let us see the baby."

Geary thought his heart would burst with happiness as the nurse showed his baby girl to the excited foursome. Even through the glass, Geary could tell that the baby had blue eyes. She was lively, too. First she yawned. Then she frowned. Then she cried. So loud were her cries that Geary could hear the sounds even through the thick glass. "Look at her. She even has golden hair!"

Geary asked if he could see his wife. The doctor said it would be a very good idea.

Geary walked quietly into his little wife's room. "Darling! Oh, darling, we have a beautiful baby girl."

Janie was still under the influence of the sedatives. "Oh, hello, Geary. Did you feed the cats? When can we go home? The doctor thinks the baby will be early. I'll bet it's next week for sure."

Geary tried to explain, but Janie was still chatting about other matters. He said, "Look, honey, you think about this for a while and I'll be back. We have a girl!"

GEARY hurried to the telephone. He had promised Janie that he would call as many of their friends as possible. And their many friends had insisted that he call regardless of the hour.

Sleepy-voiced Elizabeth Taylor answered the sharp ringing of her telephone. Geary shouted, "Liz, we have a baby girl!"

By now, Michael Wilding, Liz's husband, was wide awake. "Tell him we're on our way to the hospital."

Geary tried to tell the Wildings it was too late for them to drive all the way to Santa Monica, but they insisted.

It was close to 3:00 AM when Liz and Mike rushed into the hospital. Beautiful Liz Taylor was so happy, there were tears in her eyes as she embraced the happy father. "Geary, may we see the baby—and Janie?"

A quick meeting was held. Several staff nurses decided that it would be all right. After all, Liz Taylor had come all that way—and she herself would be having a baby in another month. So, it would be all right. Liz was still crying when she saw the lovely infant.

Jane was still a little incoherent when the Wildings walked into her room. "Hi, kids," she greeted them. She tried to collect her thoughts. "It's so sweet of you to have come here this time of night. It is night, isn't it?"

They all laughed at that, and then they left Janie to sleep and rest.

Mike, Liz and Geary went to the hospital chapel. There they bowed their heads in a prayer of thanks.

Like three over-grown children they bounced out to the Wildings' car. Even Liz had forgotten for a moment that she, too, would soon be a mother. They had gone no more than a few blocks, when, suddenly, the car sputtered and stopped dead in the middle of Santa Monica Boulevard.

The men waved handkerchiefs while Liz blinked her lights at oncoming cars. Cars would slow down and then speed rapidly away. Finally, Liz suggested, "You boys blink the lights. I'll do the handkerchief waving."

This proved to be eminently successful, for the first car stopped and gave them help.

Liz grinned. "You see, even in my condition, I can still stop a car."

After eating a snack, Geary finally reached home just after 5:00 AM. He tumbled into bed with a happy smile.

At 8:00 AM, he was wide awake. He telephoned Janie. "How are you, darling?"

Janie was just fine. She said, "I guess I must have been a little sleepy when you came into my room. But I know all about everything now. I'm so happy. And isn't it wonderful that we have a little girl. Now we can use the name, Suzanne Ileen Stefan. And we can call her 'Sis'—just as we hoped. By the way, dear, please call as many more people as you can. And hurry to see me. I miss you very much and want to see you."

WHEN Geary went back to St. John's, he took a present to Janie. Matching gold earrings and ring, made especially for her by Don Hoffman. When Janie saw them, she said, "Oh, Geary, they're so beautiful. I know, they'll be for Christmas."

Geary said, "No, dear, this is for the most exciting occasion in the world. There will be other presents for Christmas."

Your reporter left Geary and Janie then and walked down the hall to talk to Sister John Marie. Her blue eyes sparkled behind gold-rimmed glasses. "Aren't you proud to know such a nice young couple? They are so happy. Yesterday afternoon, when they were here, I showed them the nursery and, told them about everything. They told me they had prayed to God that he would give them a good, normal, healthy baby. And God has answered their prayer."

the house I love

(Continued from page 60) It is not only like a religion, this house which I love but am not in; it is like my religion, my own church, which I love but am not in.

This is the way it has to be, and a man must be satisfied.

I wish I could say I was a good Catholic. My divorce, my second marriage, rules out any possibility of such a claim. But I am a believer. I will live and die a believer. I may never actually get any closer to my religion than the house I long for—but in my heart it is mine.

You know, kids get started out in ways long before they do any thinking of where they are going. It happened that I angled out early and sharp from the good life. I played hookey so often I never got to know the names of half the kids in my class. When I walked into the corner candy store it was not for candy but for cigarettes—and not to buy them if I could swipe them. I did this so often that eventually I looked on stealing cigarettes as a habit rather than a crime. If I ever said a prayer in those days, it never amounted to more than the hope that I wouldn't turn coward and run away from a fist fight. As I got older I did like to keep pretty neat, but that, you might say, was one of the effects girls had on me. If, at my parents' insistence, I went to church, I was a cinch bet to sneak out before the service was over. If I didn't go when my folks sent me, I'd lie that I did; on a Palm Sunday, for instance, I'd grab some palms somewhere, off another kid probably, and wear them home to make my mom feel good. For the short sessions I would be in church I can never recall listening to the priest; I think I would fall into some cataleptic state and not know what was going on for as long as I sat there. And long before I was 20 I showed a fine talent for card-dealing, working a crap table and running a roulette wheel. My Aunt Mary used to like to discuss my future. Her favorite prediction: "You'll end up in the electric chair."

It's not so funny. Of the kids I knew, more than I like to think about have done or are doing time in prison. When I look at them, when I see what has happened to them, a shiver works up my back sometimes. I could easily have gone that way all the way . . . what stopped me?

THE best answer I have is that my parents knew what they were doing when they kept me going to church . . . even though I balked, and ducked out, and was never attentive. Every Sunday was a new Sunday as far as they were concerned; every Sunday I was a good boy and had never been a bad boy. It was as if their hope for me never died, and as if they were doggedly certain the church would get through to me eventually.

It did. Quietly, and mostly just as a feeling, I began to realize there was something to it. It started with a discovery that I was enjoying going. I still didn't listen much to our pastor, Father Richter, but I liked being in church . . . the quiet, the peace. It was as if instinctively, I knew I needed this to combat all the crazy, restless ideas that were always running through my head. I wasn't the complete convert, but I was certain that my religion would always be part of my life now.

I remember when I was 15, I wanted to dress up for the Easter church services. My father had got me a new suit and shoes, but this wasn't enough. I figured that he and my mother were going to a later service than I was, so I went to his room and did some unauthorized borrowing. A little later Pop and Mom decided to go to the same service, and Pop had a heck of a time wondering what happened to his stuff. When they got into their pews they saw me . . . wearing Pop's necktie, wristwatch, spats, silk handkerchief in my breast pocket, and with his hat on the bench alongside me. The priest was talking about two robbers . . . the two who died with Christ. I felt panicky.

I think what helped me a great deal as a boy was my father's youthfulness . . . he was almost like one of us kids when it came to games and he would join us every time he could get away from his barber shop . . . and sometimes when he should have stayed and attended to his business. In the rear of the main public library in Steubenville there was a large empty lot on which we boys used to play scrub football. The only trouble was that we were noisy, and the neighbors constantly complained to the police. I can still see all of us suddenly scrambling one afternoon when the police broke up a game . . . and running for all he was worth, right alongside of me, was Pop!

My trouble was that I didn't confine my games to football and baseball; I was still in high school when I started to take an interest in the games they played in back of the cigar store at that time. You can imagine how much interest I had in my homework when 20 minutes after I left the classroom I might be dealing cards over a poker table. I was one of the poor scholars in mathematics, but I had a sharp head for the odds in shooting craps and I could riffle through a stack of chips with my eyes closed and tell you how many there were. For that matter, all I had to do was look at the stack. It wasn't long before I was making as much as $35 a night, counting my tips, and it seemed to me that that was to be my future . . . working on the house side of the gambling tables. I was 17 years old. In a year I made enough money to buy a home for my folks.

THIS was the beginning of an old 'teenhood. Soon, during school vacations, I was traveling with other dealers to places like Covington, Kentucky, Reno and Las Vegas in Nevada, and even down to Miami Beach. I wasn't a man yet but I had a chance to study men—at their worst, usually, with greed in their eyes but despair in their hearts. I handled thousands of dollars, and I learned how to detour some of them so they would find their way into my pocket. But I wasn't happy. The truth was I became troubled.

Try as I would, I couldn't very well hide the fact that the money which found its way to me was money somebody else had to lose. I tried to, but what would bring it home was the fact that many of the players were friends of mine . . . some of them good friends. I would get all twisted inside seeing someone I liked very much stand in front of me and lose money he couldn't afford. Many times I would throw such fellows the "sleepers" on the table . . . money that other fellows had won without realizing it.

I would keep telling myself that what I was doing wasn't wrong, but I never was able to convince myself completely about this. One night, on my way home, I stopped in at the church and put some money in the poor box, thinking that would help. But it didn't work. The thing was that I was beginning to visualize myself as a man, perhaps married, and I just couldn't take the picture of my children telling friends that their pop was a wheel-dealer.

All this time, of course, my school marks were making nobody happy and my mother pretty miserable. I will never forget her lecture to me one night when she saw my mark for algebra—something closer to zero than 100 per cent.

"Well, I'll tell you, Mom," I replied, "for what I want to do in life I won't need to know anything about algebra."

"What do you want to do?" she asked. "I haven't got that figured out yet but I won't need algebra," I assured her.

Mom wanted both my brother, Bill, and me to go to college. But I chose that very same night to kill that idea, too. "I'm going to leave the education in this family to Bill," I said. "I won't go past high school."

"Do you think you'll be happier that way?" she asked.

"I'm sure of it," I answered.

Mom nodded. "All right," was her verdict. "You're old enough to know for yourself. Let neither of us hear any regrets about it."

It's funny, but once that was decided I was a better boy in school. It was much as if I wanted to make the best of my last days in it. I don't mean I was a better student—just in conduct. Before, I had 100 ways of making a nuisance of myself, most of them involving ways of diverting the teacher's attention or provoking arguments that would kill school time. I used to ask "loaded" questions, the kind that sound innocent enough but open up opportunities for argument that the whole class could join. For instance, one afternoon I asked our math instructor if a man had to know bookkeeping to be an executive.

"Of course," he answered, not thinking anyone was out to trap him.

"Then the president of the country has to keep its books?" I followed up.

"Oh, no," he had to reply. "There is a comptroller who does that, and accountants in the treasury and tax departments."

"Then an executive doesn't have to know all this stuff," I declared triumphantly.

He went into a long explanation, but every time he stopped I would pretend to be dumb and stubbornly insisted that, just the same, I was right. I was being a smart aleck, of course. I just wanted to make him lose his temper. It isn't any wonder that one day he went to my mother and asked her help to get me to stop disrupting his class.

I LEFT school, but my brother Bill kept on and eventually went to Boston University, where he graduated as a civil engineer. Me, I went into show business and started starving for a while. Not long, but long enough, if you understand.

I used to sing around town for fun, and a guy who does that and has any sort of voice is liable to find himself lined up with an orchestra the first thing he knows. The only reason I agreed to join one was that with my inner turmoil about my gambling I was willing to take a chance at getting away from it. I had no great urge to be a singer. I just wanted a little peace inside of me. I wanted to be able to sit in church and not feel so much like a pretender.

It was a bit of a sacrifice to leave the card and roulette tables; I didn't get the same kind of money singing. An example is what happened in Chicago. I had a room, one suit and enough money for the next couple of meals. That wasn't too bad . . . but that day the thermometer dropped to around zero. I sat down and wrote a letter to my father. He and Mom still kid me about it. I wrote, "Dear Pop, I wonder if you would get me an overcoat in Steubenville. I don't like the kind they sell in Chicago."

As you can see, I had pride. But I also had the chills.

Once I was singing in Columbus, Ohio, and my mother came to see me. From the kind of letters she had been sending I had an idea she was going to try and talk me into coming back home. I didn't want to do that because I felt I would fall into my old ways. To make her feel more secure about me I bought a religious medal and, when she came back to my dressing room, I made sure that she saw I was wearing it.

She made no comment, but her eyes told me how pleased she was, and not a word came about giving up my singing. After she had left I took off the medal, but while I still held it in my hand, I began to look at it. It had done a good little job, I realized—for both my mother and myself. That was its function. Thinking about this, there was only one thing left to do. I hung it back around my neck. It is still there to this day.

It may be that the church is responsible for the fact that I am less a worrier than I have ever been . . . certainly far less, apparently, than most people I meet. Everyone knows that my partner, Jerry Lewis, is a bundle of nerves.

Before we have to go on stage he is as nervous as a cat and I have tried many times to talk him into a calmer mood. "What are you afraid of?" I asked. "There is nobody out there with a gun, you know. And in a few minutes it's over and we are off again."

"Quiet!" he will yelp. "I'm still laying six to five you're going to end up in the hot seat."

In this Jerry agrees with my old Aunt Mary, as you can see. But if I ever were actually on my way to the electric chair, the warden of the prison where I was being held would have a tough time. Jerry would be all over his neck accusing him of breaking up the greatest act we'd ever had. Actually a man who worries about what's going to happen to him in this world is wasting brainpower and heart strength. Anything can happen. The other day while driving on a mountain road I hit an unmarked curve and barely made it around on two wheels. For a second there I hung right above a sheer drop of hundreds of feet. I might have gone either way and there was nothing I could do about it. The motors of a plane have stopped while I was a passenger, and, once, a good-sized section of a stone ledge fell off a roof and nearly made a grease spot out of me. About this, about what happens to the flesh, there is little a man can do. He is left with only one option about himself—to choose his spiritual future.

At least, this is how I boil it down, this is what's in my mind when I go out evenings to sit on the front steps. Across from me the pillars of my dream-mansion gleam white in the street light, the house sits back square and true . . . a place of hope and comfort, and talking to me somehow about God and His plans for me. No wonder I listen. And somehow, in the quiet of the night, I am able to hear Him with my eyes and my heart.

THE HOLLYWOOD SET

By MARY MARATHON

Rosemary Clooney's vivid personality seeped right through the microphone onto stacks of platters of "Come On-A My House" and "Botch-A-Me," records which swung her to the top of the list of singing artists and focussed the eyes of Hollywood upon her. Paramount invited her to come on to their lot for a screen try and almost in the next breath Rosemary romped off with a starring contract. After seeing "The Stars Are Singing," Rosemary's first picture, I can well understand why this bright newcomer to Hollywood is the talk of the town! She's a treat for your ears and she's very easy on the eyes!

Starring with Rosemary in this sprightly Technicolor picture are Anna Maria Alberghetti and Lauritz Melchior. Youthful Anna Maria, introduced by Bing in "Here Comes The Groom," won the immediate and enthusiastic acceptance of screen fans and critics. This golden-voiced youngster can act and she's gay, too. In "The Stars Are Singing," it's a kick when she joins Rosemary and her pals in a singing commercial. Lauritz Melchior? His role of "Papa Poldi," a former Metropolitan Opera great who has been licked by a swelled head, has overtones of gentleness but he gives it the Melchior vigor we've come to expect. And he's in lusty voice! Talking of voice, there's one character in this show that doesn't have much of a speaking part, but he'll slay you! His name is Red Dust, world's laziest and funniest—dog!

For good measure, there's a heart-warming story. Katri (Anna Maria) in seeking out Papa Poldi, lands in the Greenwich Village apartment where Terry (Rosemary) has gathered 'round her a merry group of young hopefuls who are struggling toward success in the entertainment world. Being a stowaway, Katri is to be deported. Terry and her gang, along with Papa Poldi, say "no can do"... then swing into action with the vigor of a detachment of Marines. Just leave your worries on the doorstep and direct your feet to the sunny side of screen entertainment when "The Stars Are Singing" comes your way!

Mention of Marines, which I did a few sentences ago, reminds me that I've another fun picture to report on—"Pleasure Island." Here we have 1500 Marines, not engaged in war on "Pleasure Island"—just a bit of skirmishing among themselves to capture the attentions of three lovely girls. What delightful odds! How come 1500 men and three girls? On a South Pacific Island lives Roger Halyard, British Copra grower, with his three pretty, young daughters and a housekeeper. Except for Halyard and his agent, the island is practically manless. Suddenly the Marines appear to construct a landing strip. It's a riot thereafter! Halyard, so VERY correct, almost loses his mind as well as his three darling daughters. The girls have a fine time! The picture is in Technicolor, which is special when a South Pacific Island is the locale. Leo Genn plays the father, Elsa Lanchester the housekeeper, Joan Elan, Audrey Dalton and Dorothy Bromiley, those three lovelies, are the darling daughters.

* * *

Next month I'll be ready to give you the details on "Pony Express," starring Charlton Heston, Rhonda Fleming, Jan Sterling and Forrest Tucker. It's a vivid picturization, in Technicolor, of the most colorful era in our nation's history—a tribute to those rugged men of vision, Buffalo Bill Cody and Wild Bill Hickok! More anon.

ANN BLYTH'S MARRIAGE PLANS . . . PARTY-OF-THE-MONTH: ETHEL MERMAN'S FAREWELL FLING . . . THE

WHILE Ann Blyth has officially made no wedding plans to marry Dr. James McNulty, they'll marry after she finishes Rose Marie, her first picture at MGM on her new and wonderful contract.

I talked to Ann the day after she sent word to me of her coming marriage, and I've never heard a girl sound so radiantly happy.

I had suspected that she and Dr. Jim were in love, and said that nothing would surprise me less than if they got married.

We were together at the Screen Producers' Guild party, and I saw Dr. Jim surreptitiously take her hand and Ann blushed to the roots of her hair.

At that time I whispered to her, "Are you engaged?" She said, "He hasn't asked me yet." It was a month later that Dr. Jim slipped a diamond engagement ring on her finger, and Ann told me her happy news.

Ann has gone out on dates with boys, of course, as any young girl does, but she has never been silly or gaga. In fact, when Dr.

Jim put his arm over the back of her chair, and held her hand, I knew this was it. Ann, who has always had the reputation of being very standoffish, was beaming.

The marriage of these two young people is so wonderful, because both are of the same faith, and they start off in the right way, with a religious ceremony.

Dr. Jim, who is a successful young obstetrician, is the brother of Dennis Day.

THE many stars who turned out for the "farewell" party agent George Rosenberg gave honoring Ethel Merman at Romanoff's proved as much as anything just how popular zestful Ethel is with the movie crowd.

The Queen of Broadway musicals was a "doll" all during the making of Call Me Madame at 20th and had everybody singing her praises. That isn't always the case with these Broadway imports, either.

Zsa Zsa Gabor, ablaze with jools, plus George Sanders, sat at our table. When someone said he was surprised that Zsa Zsa would set foot in Romanoff's after his Imperial Highness, Mike, had called her a "phoney," she said:

"I don't care what Mike calls me—I'll still love him." Pretty nice for a girl who's supposed to be a firecracker.

Ethel, the one and only Merman, was done to the teeth in red (seems to be the favorite color this season). Of course, everyone insisted that she give with a few numbers and she did.

She asked Gordon MacRae to sing "You're Just In Love" with her—and poor Gordon was game; even though he didn't know the number, he tried. Van Johnson, who knows it backwards and forwards, was left sitting on the sidelines.

THIS party officially ended the long-lasting feud between sisters Joan Fontaine and Olivia deHavilland. Just as Joan arrived at the party, escorted by Collier Young, she met Olivia leaving the outside dining room at Romanoff's. The two girls clasped hands, and the next Sunday, Olivia took her son Benjy to Joan's house, and they had a nice talk.

While perhaps they'll never be as close as some sisters, at least they've started on the way to soothe the hurt that had been in each of their hearts for so long.

Getting back to Ethel's party—Joan Crawford attracted attention, as usual, for an unusual reason: Her hair was almost "crew-cut" short, uncurled, and slicked straight back from her face. Joan can get away with anything, of course, but I really do like her with a more becoming and softer coiffure.

Another oddity: Richard Greene came "stag"—an awful waste of escort when there are so many dateless gals in this town.

AFTER everything had more or less calmed down with Mario Lanza, Mrs. Lanza got in a face-slapping incident with a parking lot boy. The boy came to me with a long tale of woe about how Mrs. Lanza slapped him and got him discharged.

As I suspected—there were two sides to the story. There always are.

Mario's wife admitted that she was highly nervous (it was just a few days before the birth of the Lanza son), but she said the boy was very rude and taunting and kept talking about "rich movie stars who drive Cadillacs."

The manager of the parking lot says that the incident with Mrs. Lanza was NOT responsible for the boy's losing his job. Says he had many complaints from others—and this was just the final straw.

Be that as it may, Mario, himself, is in a very fine humor. He is delighted over the birth of his first son, Mario, Jr. (they have two little girls).

He's still at odds with MGM as this is written—but I think it won't be too long before even that long-drawn-out hassle is settled and Mario is back making movies at the home studio.

THE worried look on young Carleton Carpenter's face had all of his friends wondering.

The reason back of the whole thing was that he had taken a suspension, and he feared that he might never get a good part on the MGM lot again. He also thought Dobie Gillis would go to some other actor, and he wanted it badly.

But young Carp reckoned without his popularity and the esteem in which he's held by his studio. He was taken off suspension as suddenly as he was put on, and given this job he wanted so much.

The teenage cuties are gnashing their teeth because Bob Wagner continues to date Barbara Stanwyck.

One movie starlet who would like very much to be dating Bob herself, said: "Whatever does he see in HER? She's been naturally gray-headed for years!!"

WHEN Ava Gardner was so ill with dysentery in a London hospital, after picking up a germ in Africa, she cabled Frank Sinatra, "HAVE LOST TEN POUNDS IN TEN DAYS. WHAT'S LEFT OF ME LOVES YOU."

Ann Blyth dreamily waltzes in the arms of her fiance, Dr. James McNulty. To learn how Ann met, and became engaged to Jim, see page 34.

NEWS

FONTAINE-D & HAVILLAND FEUD ENDS

I LIKE Liz Taylor, and I know she didn't mean it the way it sounded, but I wish she hadn't said when she went to court to pick up the $45,000 saved out of her salary during the years she was a minor:

"The bonds have been ready to pick up for two years. But I've been so busy I haven't had time to come downtown to get them."

Oh, Liz—that's a lot of money to be TOO BUSY to collect.

RED SKELTON had been reading about Christine Jorgenson (the GI who had his sex changed from male to female via operation and hormones), just before he was wheeled in for his own "upside-down stomach" surgery at St. John's Hospital.

Cracked red-headed Red, "If I come out of this Arlene Dahl, tell Fernando Lamas first."

That Red could wisecrack at all is a wonder. He had just weathered the unhappiest week of his life. On the verge of a nervous breakdown from overwork, he had gone off the deep end, left home and Georgia and the children, and called newspapermen that he was divorcing Georgia.

Among a blast of statements I am sure he is sorry he ever made, Red said that Georgia locked him out of her room and the children's rooms and that she didn't want to be in love with him any longer.

"I am so in love it's pitiful," he wailed from the hotel room he had taken.

Georgia was deeply hurt—but she proved what a fine wife she is by being the first at his bedside when he was stricken ill on the set of The Great Diamond Robbery and rushed to the hospital.

I hope, and so do all Red's friends, that this enforced rest will be just what he needs to get his health back and to once again be the good father and devoted husband he always is—when he is himself.

PERSONAL OPINIONS: I know Shelley Winters is miserably unhappy, lonely, frequently ill and down in the dumps about being separated from Vittorio Gassman while awaiting the birth of her baby. But, honestly, Shell shouldn't go around in public wearing faded blue jeans (which she keeps fastened in front with a safety pin) and Hawaiian print blouses. On second thought, I feel awfully sorry for Shelley no matter what she wears. . . .

I doubt if Ava Gardner will ever stick out those necessary 18 months in Europe for tax reduction purposes. She's too homesick. . . .

No one, not even the press agents, will convince me that Marilyn Monroe and Jane Russell are palsy-walsy and dear chums

Thanks for the Memory

■ Next time you hear old ski-nose take a chorus of his theme song, try to remember the first time you heard it. It was introduced and sung by a new face on your screen. The Big Broadcast Of 1938 marked Bob Hope's debut. In 15 years it has echoed all over the world, in Army camps, hospitals, on battlefronts—anywhere Bob's infectious good humor could make tired men and women laugh a little. Few entertainers have given so much of themselves to help others, few have become world-wide institutions in the process. In recognition of Bob Hope's 15 years of growing greatness, the Entertainment World has given over the week of February 22 as Bob Hope Week, to be topped on February 27 with a testimonial dinner for Bob at the Friars' Club. Celebrities everywhere join the little people to say, "Thanks, Bob—thanks for the memory!"

Bob's face, now a landmark, first appeared in Paramount's Big Broadcast Of 1938. He sang "Thanks for the Memory" with Shirley Ross.

During World War II, Bob was never too busy to tour army hospitals or entertain at the front. G.I.'s all over the world thank and love him.

In 15 years, Bob's never turned down a worthy cause, has played hundreds of benefits. Pals like Lomour and Colonna often join him.

Good-natured rivalry between Bing Crosby, Pittsburgh Pirate, and Cleveland Indian Bob is part of their deep and lasting friendship.

A crowning moment for Bob was returning to his native England for a Command Performance in 1947 and presentation to the Queen.

A broken arm can't stop Bob from signing autographs, or anything he can for the fans who, he maintains, have done so much for him.

the question and they took over the Bel-Air Country Club lock, stock and bar!

WHAT a party!

The decorations throughout carried out the holiday spirit of red and green and I'm sure it was no accident that Gloria's beautiful gown was in vivid red. She looked so lovely and so healthy—and if she seemed unusually attentive to two doctors present, Dr. Mark Rabwin and Dr. Leon Krohn, it is because they saved her life when she was so desperately ill following the birth of the Stewart twins.

Jimmy was a wonderful host and danced with all the gals—even me!

Joan Crawford came with director Nick Ray who used to be married to Gloria Grahame. Gloria isn't Joan's favorite actress, and vice versa, I might add.

I dined with the William Goetzes and Jack and Mary Benny, people I like very, very much. What a darling that Jack is.

June Allyson, who never looks more than 18, looked even younger with what I am sure is the shortest haircut in town. She and Dick Powell came to our table and talked a long, long time.

Among other guests having a très gay time were Gracie Allen, Janet Gaynor, Adrian, and Loretta Young who wore sombre black lace.

WILL Robert Taylor EVER marry again? I think these quotes, direct from Bob, will be of great interest to Ursula Thiess and several other beauties he's been dating recently.

Says Bob, "Sure, I'd like to get married. I'd hate to think I was going to keep on NOT being married. That's a grim future to face. But take a look around at the available girls in town.

"Most of them I've known a number of years. Some are not my type. I know I'm not theirs. They seem to think I'm in training to become a permanent rolling stone!

"Besides, by and large, they are career girls. That comes first. So where do I find the girl?"

How about someone outside the industry, a non-professional?

"That's a good thought," he smiled, "but how do I meet one? As you know, any time I'm not in Hollywood, I like to hunt and fish—and there are very few girls around hunting and fishing."

Of his marriage to Barbara Stanwyck, for 11 years regarded as one of Hollywood's finest, he says, "It was one of those things. Who's to know who's to blame. I'm sorry it broke up. Barbara and I see each other occasionally, maybe dinner once a month or so.

"I have nothing against women, bless 'em.

When a girl changes schools, what's a good move?

- ☐ Try stalking the stags ☐ Pick yourself a pal

As "the new girl," you'll be noticed—but don't expect a brass band greeting. (Your new classmates may be shy, too!) Why not ask one gal to share a Slurp Special at the local fizz palace? Bimebye, you'll be buddies. Getting okayed by the ladies first—leads to meeting the boy-people. Same as the confidence you need, on certain days, begins with the comfort you get with Kotex. This napkin (so absorbent!) has softness that holds its shape. Made to stay soft for hours and hours!

Which "look" is best for lasses with glasses?

- ☐ Uncluttered ☐ Dramatic ☐ Coquette

If you've got specs before your eyes, choose headgear becoming to your face type. Dodge severe or frilly-filly effects. Keep your brow uncluttered. A soft, simple hairdo plus a small or medium brimmed chapeau should suit you. For a smooth look on calendar days, let Kotex keep you outline-free. You'll see—those flat pressed ends prevent revealing outlines!

Are you in the know?

What to do about the Spaniel Type?

- ☐ Rush away screaming ☐ Linger and learn

Adoring Egbert—always underfoot! A good kid, but you don't get his message: you're too busy torching for frost-hearted Ted. Should you ditch Eggie? Better linger. You'll learn how to charm other gents. And at trying times, learn about poise from Kotex and that safety center—(your extra protection). In all 3 absorbencies: Regular, Junior, Super.

More women choose KOTEX* than all other sanitary napkins

"When it finally rained, I worked outdoors in sopping wet clothes for days! My skin just couldn't take it without soothing Jergens Lotion. It kept my face and hands beautifully soft."

"Making these windy ferry-boat scenes chapped my skin raw, but Jergens Lotion rescued me again—and so quickly—'cause it's absorbed instantly! See why: Smooth one hand with Jergens..."

"Apply any lotion or cream to the other hand. Then wet them. Water won't bead on the 'Jergens hand' as it will over a lazy, oily skin care."

"For close-ups, my skin was always soft and properly romantic, thanks to Jergens Lotion!" No wonder Hollywood stars choose Jergens Lotion 7 to 1!

Use Jergens regularly on your skin. You'll see why more women buy Jergens Lotion than any other hand care in the world. 10¢ to $1.00, plus tax.

AT THE end of their marriage Anne Baxter and John Hodiak released this statement to me: "Our decision to separate after six years is a painful one. We have tried very hard to avoid the finality of the word divorce. Above everything else we wanted our marriage to be a success. We have denied the many rumors in the past month, both to our friends and to the press, because we felt sincerely that keeping our difficulties to ourselves gave us a greater opportunity to work them out. We have no other interests and no career problems. We feel heartsick and defeated that in spite of all our hopes and efforts and understanding, basic incompatibilities have made our life together impossible."

ALDO'S DREAM

■Up in Crockett, California last November, a small, brown-haired girl looked up at the blond giant who stood before her.

“Hello, Aldo,” she said, and her voice was gentle. “Are you happy down there? Have you found what you’re looking for?”

He smiled down at her. “I’m still searching,” he said. Then he put a big hand on her shoulder and said, “You’re very sweet.”

It was a scene that would have answered a lot of questions that had been buzzing around Hollywood for a year—in fact, ever since Aldo Ray hit town. People knew he was divorced, or to be more explicit, sitting out the year’s interlocutory period which is necessary by California law before a divorce becomes final.

The average Hollywoodites who sue or are sued for divorce follow a well-worn pattern. They announce the divorce decision to the studio and the press on Monday, and on Tuesday night are seen around town with somebody new. This inevitably starts a chain reaction of dates, all of which are suspected of being serious romances, and none of which mean very much. There seems to be a compulsion to be a gay divorcée, and Hollywood has come to look upon such shenanigans as accepted behavior.

Nothing to mix or fix

"It's simpler than setting your hair!"

Light and Bright

by RICHARD HUDNUT is the newest cosmetic gift to blondes, brunettes, redheads, with dull or lifeless looking hair. It's an entirely different kind of home hair lightener, a cosmetic really, that gives you natural-looking color that won't wash out because it brings out the lightness inherent in your hair. Not a dye, or rinse, it's a simple, single solution you apply directly to your hair to lighten and brighten a little or a lot depending on how many times you use it. And it's so easy to use. No mixing, timing or shampooing. So safe, too. Light and Bright contains no ammonia and the color change is gradual because you yourself decide how many applications to have. Gargle LISTERINE ANTISEPTIC Quick!

Among the "Secondary Invaders" Are Germs of the Pneumonia and "Strep" Types.

These and other "secondary invaders," as well as germ-types not shown, can be quickly reduced in number by the Listerine Antiseptic gargle.

(1) Pneumococcus Type III, (2) Hemophilus influenzae, (3) Streptococcus pyogenes, (4) Pneumococcus Type II, (5) Streptococcus salivarius.

It Can Help Head Off Trouble or Lessen Its Severity

YES, used thoroughly and often; Listerine Antiseptic can actually help head off a cold or sore throat due to a cold, or lessen their severity.

It fights infections as an infection should be fought . . . with quick, germ-killing action.

Listerine Antiseptic reaches way back on throat surfaces to kill millions of germs, including those called "secondary invaders" (see panel above). These are the very bacteria that often are responsible for so much of a cold's misery when they stage a mass invasion of the body through throat tissues. Listerine Antiseptic attacks them on these surfaces before they attack you.

Remember that tests made over a 12-year period showed that regular twice-a-day users of Listerine had fewer colds and generally milder ones than non-users; and fewer sore throats.

So, at the first symptom of a cold—a sneeze, cough or throat tickle—gargle with Listerine Antiseptic. It has helped thousands . . . why not you? Lambert Pharmacal Company Division of The Lambert Company, St. Louis 6, Missouri.

aldo's dream

(Continued from page 16) condones the practice of the separated couple talking about each other in carefully couched phrases. Things like, "I wouldn't want to say it was her fault," or, "Well, I tried, but he wouldn't cooperate."

Aldo Ray was different. He didn't talk to anyone about his marriage. He simply said that he had married a girl from his home town when they were both quite young, that they hadn't made a go of it, and that now it was all over. He refused to make further comment, and he also declined to mention her name. The simple fact of the matter is that Aldo was behaving like a gentleman. He felt that his estranged wife was entitled to live her own life and to be spared the fuss and bother of publicity that would have showered her had he divulged the story in more detail.

It took more than a little courage to do this, for in his position Aldo was wide open to the pat criticism of actors who hit the big time and are then divorced from their childhood sweethearts. It was natural for people to suppose that his head had grown in proportion to his income and that he no longer felt the marriage was a suitable one. These things were whispered as a matter of course. They were even taken for granted, as are many of the similar cases in Hollywood. This is unfortunate, for a great number of such divorces are the result of a schism that had come long before success. This was the case with Aldo Ray.

He wasn't seen very much at the bright spots. He rented a little house in Malibu, facing the ocean, and he hibernated there for more than six months, making the long drive every day into Columbia Studio. When he did stay in town for an evening he was either stag or with a group of friends. There wasn't much for the press to bite into, and they were puzzled. Aldo's actions are easily explainable. His divorce was not final until November 16th of last year, and he felt that until that time he had no right to be seen publicly with another girl.

This story will tell, for the first time, the things about which Hollywood has wondered for so long.

ALDO grew up in a big, boisterous, warm-hearted family. His parents, Silvio and Maria DaRe, were born in Italy but came to America before they started their family of six sons and one daughter. It was a good home for a boy to grow in, and despite the happiness of the elder DaRes and the love that poured from them over their children, Aldo was a typical boy in that he regarded females as creatures to be left simpering over their dolls while he went out and kicked a football.

He was 15 when he first kissed a girl, and still remembers the shock with which he realized that he wanted to kiss her. He gave her a hasty smack and then turned and fled down the street. It set off the chemical reaction which catapulted him into a string of average, schoolboy puppy loves. The school at Crockett was unified with that of Rodeo, a town four miles away. As it happened during Aldo's high school years, the Crockett school was predominantly male and the Rodeo school mostly female, with the result that the Crockett boys could be seen any afternoon after school driving their jalopies the four-mile stretch to Rodeo.

The girls of both Rodeo and Crockett were crestfallen when Aldo, after graduating from high school, joined the Navy and volunteered as a (Continued on page 52)

a Bright, New Outlook for Dull, Dry Skin

by Rosemary Hall
BEAUTY AUTHORITY

How often have you been depressed at the sight of rough flakes on your skin? Skin that holds make-up in grainy blotches...looks dull and adds years to your face!

Gloom won't chase dry skin away. But, here's how you can put a fresh glow on your face, no matter how dry your skin is now! For as little as twenty-five cents, you'll find the best dry skin care money can buy—Woodbury Dry Skin Cream!

And, here's why I recommend Woodbury Dry Skin Cream: While most dry skin creams contain lanolin and other softening ingredients, some creams simply deposit them on the surface of your skin. But, Woodbury contains Penaten, a penetrating ingredient that carries the rich, softening oils deep into the corneum layer of your skin.

Penaten helps these oils penetrate so quickly, five minutes' care is all you need! But use it every day! You'll be rewarded with a fresh, youthful bloom you never dreamed possible.

Here's a simple routine to follow:

With fingertips, smooth the cream into your skin. Leave it on for five minutes...tissue off...and look in your mirror. I promise you the loveliest surprise you've seen in years. Try it tonight. Woodbury Dry Skin Cream comes in sizes from 25¢ to 97¢, plus tax.

SPECIAL TREATMENT FOR

4 PROBLEMS OF "YOUNG SKIN"

Have you noticed lately that your face seems extra oily . . . shiny?

Are pore openings becoming larger . . . blackheads beginning to appear?

This is what is happening: In your teens, the oil glands often become over-active. At the same time, the skin gets sluggish—fails to throw off the everyday accumulations of dead skin cells. When these tiny, dead flakes build up over the pore openings, enlarged pores and even blackheads are on the way.

Today—Pond's recommends a greaseless treatment for these four major problems: oiliness, sluggishness, enlarged pores and blackheads. It's easy, quick . . . and it works.

1-Minute Mask

young skin

Tonight—do this: Cover face, except eyes, with greaseless Pond's Vanishing Cream. Its "keratolytic" action loosens dead skin cells—dissolves them off! Frees tiny skin gland openings so they can function normally. After 60 seconds—tissue off. See how fresh your skin feels! How much softer and clearer it looks!

FOR THE SKIN THAT REBELS against a heavy make-up: Before powder, smooth on a greaseless film of Pond's Vanishing Cream for a smoother, fresher looking make-up.

Gambler Ty Power plays for high stakes as Piper Laurie, Julio Adams, look on.

MISSISSIPPI GAMBLER

■ In New Orleans in the 1850's life was cheap and reckless. Gents dropped like flies on the field of honor and ladies eloped with anyone just to spite their lovers. Universal goes to town on these dime novel emotions. They've put Ty Power in Technicolor, given him all the nobler virtues and made him a gambler—the only honest gambler on the Mississippi. And they've cast two lovely blossoms at his feet, namely, Piper Laurie and Julia Adams. The plot gets thicker than the river bottom. Ty comes to New Orleans to build a fancy casino. One look and he's smitten with Piper, a southern belle who'd gladly run a letter opener through his heart. He gambles with Piper's brother (John Baer) who pays off with her diamond necklace. (When Ty tries to give back the necklace Piper rears like a thoroughbred.) He gambles with Julia Adams' brother who pays off with his company's funds and regretfully shoots himself. Meanwhile the romantic triangles pile up. Julia loves Ty, Ty loves Piper, Piper's brother loves Julia, etc. A couple of duels are arranged to straighten things out, but they only make things worse. Piper runs off to marry a banker who shortly runs off with the bank, and Ty's left with gentle Julia. A lot more happens before the final clinch, but see it for yourself. Cast: Tyrone Power, Piper Laurie, Julia Adams.—Universal.

HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN

First thing to remember is, this is not the life of Hans Christian Andersen. It's the story of his faith in people and because, as the main character, he is a simple, humble teller of tales, the story itself is fragile. Hans (Danny Kaye) is a cobbler who doesn't work very hard. He likes to gather children around him and tell them fairy tales. The children forget to go to school and Hans becomes something of a nuisance. So he hikes to Copenhagen, the big city, with his apprentice (Joey Walsh). There he falls in love with a ballerina (Jeanmaire) who is married to the ballet director (Farley Granger). Hans writes a fairytale for her. It's really a love letter. She turns it into a ballet called, "The Little Mermaid," and soon Hans becomes famous. That's all. Except for the delicate colors, the beautiful scenery, the stories Hans tells and the ballets which have a wonderful dream-like quality about them.

Cast: Danny Kaye, Joey Walsh, Jeanmaire, Farley Granger, Roland Petit, Erik Bruhn.—Samuel Goldwyn.

THE LAWLESS BREED

Nobody ever shot more people dead than Rock Hudson. But he swears he did it all in self-defense. You see, he had an unhappy childhood. Dad used to beat him for playing with guns. Rock left home to make enough money to buy a ranch for Mary Castle. Too bad he has to get into a poker game and kill Gus Hanley. (Gus drew first.) That does it. Mary Castle gets it, too—from a posse that's hunting Rock down. Julia Adams, a girl he met in a saloon, helps him make a get-a-way in a buckboard. After many a year they settle down on an honest-to-goodness farm. Too bad the Texas Rangers are onto him at last, since he's made peace with himself and all. But they haul him away for 16 long years. That gives a person pause. Changes a person. He sure doesn't want his son to lead the life he led. So when Rock gets home first thing he does is stop Junior from shooting a man. Guess you can call that a happy ending.

Cast: Rock Hudson, Julia Adams, Mary Castle, John McIntyre, Race Gentry.—Universal.

FAST WOMAN

"In my business you have to be fast. I'm not a movie star or a high-fashion camera model with a make-up man and an hour to fix my hair before every appearance. I'm a Seventh Avenue dress model, always changing clothes, always in a rush. But each time I appear, I must be as calm as a duchess, groomed to perfection.

"With my hair, that was a problem! It not only looked like straw, it acted like straw in the wind.

"Then, flash!—came news of Formula 9 and the 1 Minute Miracle! One minute is all I ever have, so I tried it. And the miracle happened! In 60 seconds my hair became soft, silky, instantly manageable with more natural curl than I had ever had in my life! Now after a fast change, a mere flick of the comb and it's as smooth as an ad in Harper's Bazaar.

"Do men notice the difference? Notice it? They love Formula 9—for the well-groomed look it gives them!"

Ladies, if you too have a hair problem—whether it's dry hair, cracked and splitting ends, hair breaking off, dandruff or dull looking unmanageable hair—you'll find there is only one thing that can make your hair healthier-looking, more beautiful and instantly manageable, and that is lanolin.

For unlike vegetable and mineral oils which merely cling to the hair surface and do no good at all, lanolin is actually absorbed by the hair and penetrates the scalp. Lanolin is a natural organic oil that comes from hair—the hair of a sheep. It is nature's hair conditioner.

And only Charles Antell in famous Formula 9 has mastered the secret of refining and compounding lanolin so it is absorbed in sufficient quantity to make your hair lustrous, youthful looking, shimmering with highlights, instantly manageable—yet vanishes as you apply it. It's marvelous what it does!

That's why we say to you now, try Formula 9. Get it at any drug or cosmetic counter. We guarantee you'll have healthier-looking, more beautiful hair or it costs you nothing.

MEMBER OF THE WEDDING

This was a beautiful novel, a wonderful play and now—an excellent movie. It is the story of a 12-year-old girl who feels she doesn't belong. Everyone has someone else to love and to share life with, but not Frankie. Until now. Now her brother, a soldier, is going to be married and Frankie falls in love with the idea of the wedding. She decides that she will belong to the newlyweds who'll take her with them on their honeymoon and keep her ever after. Her two best (and only) friends—younger cousin John Henry, and a warm-hearted and wise Negro maid can't control Frankie's emotional carryings-on. But they try to; they try to understand her, and in the trying the whole turbulent world of this girl on the edge of growing up is revealed. All its wild, tender, sweet and frantic feelings rush out to grip and hold you entranced. The maid, Berenice, is played to perfection by Ethel Waters. Twenty-six-year-old Julie Harris is astonishingly convincing as 12-year-old Frankie. And Brandon De Wilde (as John Henry) holds his own in this movie which never strays far from the original conception of novelist Carson McCullers.

Cast: Ethel Waters, Julie Harris, Brandon De Wilde, James Edwards, Harry Bolden.—Columbia.

ROAD TO BALI

All the "Roads" Crosby and Hope ever take lead to a sarong filled with Lamour. Only this time it's in Technicolor. That's the picture—who needs a plot? Well, Bing and Bob are a couple of girl-crazy hoofers proposing marriage to everyone in Australia. When everyone accepts it's time to get out of town. They go by train—Bing inside, Bob on the rods. Pretty soon they jump off the train and roll into a herd of sheep. "We're poor little lambs who have lost our way," the boys sing. "Baa-baa-baa" sing the sheep. Next thing you know they have beards (the boys, not the sheep) and are signing up for a job with Murvyn Vye. He's evil, wants them to dive for buried treasure that doesn't even belong to him. Vye takes them to this island paradise where they meet the Princess (Dot Lamour) and a court of gorgeous girls. But the fun can't last. Hope has to dive for the treasure and there's a squid down there waiting to blot him out. There's more. There's a shipwreck, a headhunter's ball, a volcano (erupting), a love-happy gorilla. There's Humphrey Bogart coming out of the swamps with The African Queen. Crazy! Man!

Cast: Bob Hope, Bing Crosby, Dorothy Lamour, Murvyn Vye.—Paramount.

THE BAD AND THE BEAUTIFUL

For a long time John Shields' name was powerful in Hollywood. It was the name of a young genius of a producer (Kirk Douglas) who fought his way to the top over his father's dead body. (His father was a one-time great who died bankrupt and hated.) But Shields is on the way out now unless his friends help him. His friends think they have a lot of good reasons to let him rot. You see why in flashbacks. Barry Sullivan, a famous director, takes it from the beginning, when he and Kirk had nothing but ideas and energy, up to the time that partnership dissolved. Lana Turner picks up the thread. She's a big actress now, but when Kirk found her she was a dead movie idol's daughter heading straight for the alcoholic ward. He pushed her to the top, but he pushed her his own way.

And there's plenty Dick Powell can't forget. He's a Pulitzer Prize novelist. In a way Kirk was responsible, but he was also responsible for the one big tragedy in Dick's life. The three stories blend into a picture of a ruthless, magnetic man burning for glory. You see Hollywood from the inside, and much of the glamor and excitement of that town is in this picture.

Cast: Lana Turner, Kirk Douglas, Walter Pidgeon, Dick Powell, Barry Sullivan, Gloria Grahame.—MGM.

CONNIE

Even MGM's sorry for teachers. Teachers are not only unsung, they're underpaid. Van Johnson, poetry instructor in a small university town, lives on codfish balls. Connie (V.J.'s wife) doesn't care if he doesn't care, even though she's pregnant and craves lambchops. But V.J.'s father (Louis Calhern) is enraged. He's one of the richest men in Texas—made it on beef—and it kills him that his son won't come live on the ranch and be his heir. Teaching's for women who can't find husbands is his philosophy. Anyway, Van's up for a promotion. May get it, too, if he can feed the Dean (Gene Lockhart) better than his rival can. Only time the Dean gains weight is when a job's open. Poppa comes to town shortly before the crucial supper at Van's house and every time he opens his mouth he puts his foot in it (they're saving the food for later). Oh, Pop's got all kinds of plans to lure his son home, and a big enough bankroll to carry them out. By this time Connie (that's Janet Leigh, incidentally) is pretty hungry and falls in with her father-in-law. Despite its obsession with the digestive system this picture's pretty funny. Thanks to Louis Calhern who walks away with it. And Walter Slezak, a butcher, who helps him.

Cast: Van Johnson, Janet Leigh, Louis Calhern, Walter Slezak, Gene Lockhart.—MGM.

MY COUSIN RACHEL

The place is a lonely castle in Cornwall; the mood is ominous. Against a background of English storms and raging emotions a story of love, and possibly murder unfolds. All his life Richard Burton worshipped his cousin and foster-father (John Sutton) who is forced to go to Italy for his health. Burton never sees him again. Only letters tell what may have happened. Sutton had met "our cousin Rachel," married her and then accused her of poisoning him. Burton swears to avenge his cousin's death. Unaware of his suspicions, Rachel (Olivia de Havilland) pays a visit to Cornwall. Burton is startled by her beauty and quiet charm. He falls wildly in love with her, wants to give her the estate, the family jewels, money. His friends warn him to be more cautious—Rachel's past is shady, her actions contradictory. She leads him on, then abuses him, accepts everything he gives but never commits herself. Burton's health breaks under the strain, and once recovered he turns on her with all the fury of a tortured heart. Is she trying to poison him? Is she a murderess and a gold digger or does she really love him? Suspense mounts to a feverish pitch and ends in violence in this ambitious adaptation of Daphne Du Maurier's novel.

Cast: Olivia de Havilland, Richard Burton, George Dolenz, Audrey Dalton, Ronald Squire.—20th Century-Fox.

■ As you read this article, Mario Lanza, if he has not already, is preparing to return to work and the unprecedented campaign of vilification aimed at him and his family is beginning to taper off.

Rarely has any one entertainer, no matter how heinous the crime—been the target of as much vicious calumny as this erratic, emotionally immature but undeniably great tenor.

One is prompted to ask this all-important question: was Mario Lanza a braggart, a neurotic, a selfish ham before he declined to make The Student Prince last year, or did all these character deficiencies suddenly spring up after he refused to star in the film?

While Mario was making That Midnight Kiss, Toast Of New Orleans and The Great Caruso, he was depicted as a fine, upstanding, righteous American blessed with a voice such as is bestowed only once in a generation. Stories of his generosity, his gratitude, his kindness were circulated with great frequency, and for the most part, these stories were true.

Mario did buy his parents a home in the Pacific Palisades, furnish it, and equip it with a swimming pool. Mario did fly an afflicted little girl to Hollywood from New Jersey and infuse her with the will to live. Mario did contribute to the financial support of an abandoned waif. He did insist upon jobs for such friends as George London, Nicky Brodsky, and Ray Sinatra. He did carry on his payroll a group of human leeches and hangers-on out of the simple compassion of his heart.

And yet, once Loew's, Inc., the holding company which owns Metro Goldwyn Mayer, filed a $5,000,000 suit against him, all these examples (Continued on page 70)

LOVE

■ When the Queen Elizabeth, pride of the British commercial fleet, sailed into New York harbor last December 13th, the reporters who covered the waterfront climbed into the Coast Guard cutter that heads down the Bay.

As the cutter drew alongside the Elizabeth, the liner's accommodation ladder was lowered, and the accredited pilot of New York harbor as well as the reporters and photographers, clambered aboard.

As soon as the newsmen hit the deck they asked one question: "Where is Rita Hayworth?" Their notebooks were wide open, but they were none too hopeful.

Ever since her marriage and subsequent breakup with Aly Khan, the voluptuous hair-dyed screen siren has been a difficult personage to interview, and on this occasion, after two and a half months in Europe, Rita ran true to form.

One reporter asked if Rita planned to apply for the Nevada divorce from Aly immediately after she reached the West Coast.

Rita raised her right shoulder protectively. "Immediately, no."

"Eventually?" the reporter asked.

Rita smiled. "Possibly."

"Depending on what?" the reporter continued.

"On myself."

"We understand," another newsman said, "that you and Aly Khan didn't get along too well during the last visit. Isn't that so?"

Margarita Cansino Hayworth Judson Welles Khan said no, (Continued on page 56)

Many Hollywood wives fight a bitter battle the public never knows about . . .
their implacable enemy is Time.

BY THELMA MCGILL

■ Two hundred years ago a wise old codger named Benjamin Franklin, advised young men to marry older women on the grounds that "an older woman is more experienced, industrious, and appreciative of a younger husband."

A few years before he married his fourth wife, Lady Sylvia Ashley, Clark Gable paraphrased Franklin by saying, "Give me a mature, fully-developed, worldly woman every time. The sweet young things have their place, of course, and every man to his taste, but when it comes to settling down, I prefer to do it with a sophisticated woman who's been around."

Gable, whose first two wives were, respectively, 17 and 11 years his senior, is not the only actor who believes in marrying an older wife. Desi Arnaz, Tyrone Power, Alan Ladd, Jerry Lewis, Buddy Rogers, Richard Ney, Gary Merrill, Robert Taylor, and many others have all tried the experiment at one time or another.

Similarly, Ginger Rogers, Norma Shearer,

IS A MARRIAGE ALWAYS DOOMED TO

When Bette Davis married Gary Merrill, his career got a big boost. This, plus the fact he's the boss at home, keeps them happy together.

OLDER WIVES- YOUNG HUSBANDS

Barbara Stanwyck, Bette Davis, Rosalind Russell, Lucille Ball, Annabella, Greer Garson, and Joan Crawford have all maintained that love knows no age differential, that what counts most in marriage is love, that a youthful husband keeps his wife youthful.

Recently, Ginger Rogers aged 42, fell in love with a young Frenchman, Jacques de Bergerac, aged 24. These two were seen all over Paris together, at the famous restaurants "Tour d'Argent" and "Coq Hardi," walking hand in hand on the Champs Elysées, sipping champagne at the world renowned "Cafe de la Paix."

When Ginger returned to Hollywood to star with Bill Holden in Forever Female over at Paramount, I ran into her on the lot one day and asked about the new love in her life. "He's just a dear friend," she insisted. "It looks like an entangling alliance to me," I pressed. Ginger smiled and would say no more.

So what happened? Jacques de Bergerac flew into Hollywood in pursuit of his sweetheart, and Ginger not only confessed the existence of a full-fledged romance between them, but she took Jacques around to meet her agent, Paul Small.

"Paul," she said, "look at this man. Don't you think he can make a go of it here?"

Small is a brother-in-law to Dore Schary who runs MGM. He took Jacques over to Culver City, introduced him to Billy Grady, the Metro casting director, walked him around the Thalberg building, dropped in to see several influential executives, Eddie Mannix and Benny Thau, to name two of them. They took optical inventory of Monsieur de Bergerac—his 6-feet-2-inches, his 188 lbs., his handsome face, his brown hair. The next thing anyone knew, Bergerac was under contract to the studio; and Gertrude Fogler, the voice coach, had been assigned to teach him intelligible English.

When the news broke around Hollywood that Ginger's new sweetheart had been signed to a contract at Metro, a studio which had been releasing many of its younger players such as Peter Lawford, Ralph Meeker, Dawn Addams, Monica Lewis, and others, one of Ginger's non-admirers said cattily, "There was a time when Rogers could attract a man with her beauty. Now she has to wield her influence."

That isn't true at all. Despite the fact that she will never see 40 again, Ginger Rogers Culpepper Ayres Briggs is still a magnetic, curvaceous eyeful. There is no doubt, however, but that she went to bat for her young lover. That seems to be the fashion today. Look at Shelley Winters. She took Vittorio Gassman, a fine Italian actor virtually unheard of in this country, and within 90 days made him a celebrity. She not only introduced him to the Hollywood bigwigs as one of the world's great actors, but she hired the Circle Theatre in Hollywood (Continued on page 64)

END IN RENO WHEN THE WIFE IS OLDER THAN THE HUSBAND? NO! SAY THESE HAPPY COUPLES AND PROVE IT.

Six years older than her husband, Lucille Ball feels this difference saved their marriage! Her greater maturity stabilized his impetuousness!

Patti Lewis' age has helped her cope with Jerry's insecure, rather neurotic personality. A younger girl would not have had this wisdom.

Buddy Rogers and older Mary Pickford are a perfect example of how two show people of equal fame and fortune can be together.

HOLLYWOOD DIDN'T EVEN KNOW ROCK HUDSON WAS AROUND . . .

BIG NOISE FROM WINNETKA

by Louis Pollock

"A beautiful hunk of man" is how his many fans describe this six-foot-three newcomer. Rock's grateful for their adulation, and for their constructive criticism (like "cut your hair" and "stand up straight") also.

A small, sun-drenched house atop one of the Hollywood Hills is Rock's bachelor haven. He enjoys living alone, but admits that marriage is on his mind, sort of. He's considered one of Hollywood's best catches.

Time out for relaxing is a real luxury to Rock, who achieved some sort of distinction at Universal-International studio by working for five months straight without a single day off, right after he first signed his contract.

Rock's come a long way from the $60-a-week truck driver he used to be but, despite his growing screen popularity, he's still not too sure of himself. Socially, he is more at ease with old friends than new acquaintances.

BUT WHEN FANS BEGAN TO WHOOP AND HOLLER, IT TOOK A LOOK—AND SAW WHAT THE SHOUTING WAS ABOUT!

■ Winnetka, Illinois is a picturesque, lake-front Chicago suburb with prosperous vistas of wooded estates on which a lot of important Chicago business men raise their families. But eight or nine years ago, as far as the high-school daughters of these tycoons were concerned, the town's most natural wonder was the son of a local automobile mechanic—six-feet-three of dark, shaggy-haired boy named Roy Fitzgerald. They weren't, as the pithy saying goes, just flapping their lips. Roy has come through. He started out slowly enough when he left Winnetka, becoming, in time, no more than a $55-a-month member of the U. S. Navy, specializing in shipboard laundering; and later just a $60-a-week truck driver who whistled at girls while he worked. But today? Meet a 27-year-old shaggy-haired film star, renamed Rock Hudson, who gets $1100 a week just for being what the girls of his birthplace were inspired by in the first place—himself.

For his first two years in Hollywood he was one of dozens of frustrated youngsters who are of pictures but rarely in them . . . all remarkably good looking kids who secretly pray for a break and outwardly smile cynically about their chances. For a time he was better (Continued on page 79)

BY JIM NEWTON

It's Love for Ann Blyth!

■ Ever so long ago (as the young count time) Ann Blyth once said in an interview about love, "If it comes to that, and I marry, it would be nice if he were Irish, too." Well, wouldn't you know but that's just what she's ending up doing! He's Irish, is Dr. James V. McNulty who had the lucky good fortune to capture Ann's heart and hand; and who says about it all, "She's such a sweet girl . . . the sweetest I've met." He's as Irish as Dennis Day's brother, which he also is. And it was at a great get-together for the older folks, his and Ann's, held at her home some three years ago, that first they met.

He was just after leaving the Navy where, at first, he had been assigned to the Fifth Marines' medical unit and saw service at Iwo Jima, and, after the war, was stationed a long time at the Long Beach Naval Hospital in California. It was Dennis himself who made the introduction, leading his brother to Ann's side and practically telling the whole house, as well as her (that proud he was!), "This is the doctor I was telling you about!" Ann, who hadn't been asking about any doctor nevertheless felt better right away.

It's the doctor's privilege to make the diagnosis, but this doesn't stop a girl from trying her hand at it at a time like this. The straight facts Ann put together that moment were descriptive ones: Dr. McNulty was a man standing only an inch or so from tickling six feet, (Continued on page 55)

■ There may be better places for meeting single girls, such as church socials, school dances, and Community Chest drives, but in Hollywood and the surrounding environs, one of the most popular of the boy-meets-girl spots is the beach at Santa Monica.

One summer Sunday a few years ago, a refugee from Brooklyn, born Gerald Tierney—he has since taken the more euphonious name of Scott Brady—was lolling about the sands, flexing his well-proportioned muscles, surveying the beach for a little female companionship.

About 25 yards from where he sat, Brady suddenly spied one of the most fetching, tantalizing assortments of feminine curves ever collected in one body. The possessor of these physical charms was a tall, beautiful brunette who lay stretched languorously on the sand, resting easily on one elbow, looking up at the young man who sat beside her.

Brady, who has been slightly girl-crazy from the moment of his birth, rubbed his eyes and took another look. This was no mirage; this was a real flesh-and-blood female.

In a minute the young actor was on his feet. With a careful carelessness he began edging closer and closer to the girl. Ten yards away, he noticed that her male companion was a friend of his, Joe Gray. In a minute he had succeeded in wangling himself an introduction.

"Do you live in Los Angeles?" the bathing beauty asked Scott, "or are you just visiting?"

Brady grinned. "I live here," he said. Gosh! She was pretty.

"What do you do?" the girl continued.

Scott decided to use the modesty approach. "Just work in a lumberyard," he said. Baby! What a shape!

Joe Gray interrupted just as Scott hoped he would. "He's just kidding," Joe told the girl. "He's a movie star."

The brunette's blue eyes widened with expectancy. "Are you really?" she demanded. "Really a movie star?"

"You could call me that," Scott admitted. "But I've only been in a couple of pictures." Look at the legs on this babe!

"Please," the dark-haired girl insisted. "Tell me. What were they?"

"Nothin' much," Scott said (Continued on page 85)

YESTERDAY'S MAGIC

Grey-green walls and blue-green carpets create a cool, placid retreat from the blazing sun that toasts the beachhouse all the year round.

HOUSE OF THE MONTH

The ocean's only half-o-minute away, but Loretta's beachhouse, true to Hollywood tradition, has its own swimming pool. The patio, sheltered from the wind, is used as an extra room for outdoor entertaining.

A connoisseur of antiques, Loretta believes in making her priceless possessions "earn their keep." She uses her Chinese tea caddies as lamp bases, and the armoire against the wall serves as a bar.

A modern, glass tiled table in the dining room is surrounded by traditionally styled chairs. The row of low candles was Loretta's own idea; it provides romantic lighting without interfering with conversation.

This modern pointing in the hallway started Loretta thinking. While still leaning towards antiques, she now admits old and new can mix.

■ Peek into one Hollywood basement and you'll find a vast moist bed of mushrooms. Prowl through another and you'll come across cages full of fat chinchillas. There are vaults full of oil stocks and acres covered with champion livestock. Hollywood stars and starlets alike are busy setting up sidelines to keep them off the breadlines in case they lose their figures or their fan mail. Or else looking forward to the day they can retire and "do something else."

Not Loretta Young. She's been a favorite star for years and years, and thanks be, looks as if she'll go as far into the future as in the past. She's never going to quit. She'll never do "something else." She's already doing something "besides."

There's many a happy householder in Hollywood and vicinity that can thank Loretta for their handsome hearth. Around movie-town the talented Mrs. Tom Lewis is looked upon as real-estate agent, interior decorator, and wholesale mover. Sometimes her friends tease her about it. As a matter of fact she got a real work-out at a dinner party at Rosalind Russell's not long ago.

In the course of the evening the conversational gears were shifted into the subject of real estate. "What are the best neighborhoods out here?" the George Ewings, old friends of Roz from Connecticut, asked. "How are the taxes? Which district has the best schools?" The questions came in fast flurries. Finally (Continued on next page)

In Hollywood, it's no secret that many movie stars like to visit Loretta Young so they can come home with one or two new decorating ideas. Her porch is a typical mixture of antique and contemporary things.

Loretta and her husband Tom Lewis have lived in five different homes during the last eight years. Soon they'll move into a duplex apartment on Sunset Blvd.

Loretta Young isn't looking forward to retiring and "doing something else." Her profitable hobby, interior decorating, keeps her busy when she's in between screen assignments.

Mrs. Ewing summed up her curiosity in one sentence.

"Roz," she asked her hostess, "if you had the entire county of Los Angeles to choose from, where would you live?"

"Don't ask me," Roz smiled. "Ask Loretta. She's lived on practically every street in town."

The visitors turned toward doe-eyed Loretta. Loretta Young smiled and looked at her husband, Tom, for a little support.

"Go ahead," Lewis said. "Tell them. You're certainly qualified."

"I admit we've moved around a bit since we were married," Loretta began. "But really, every street in town, that's . . ."

"Five times in eight years," Tom Lewis said.

"Then what do you think is the best location," the Ewings insisted, "for people with children?"

Loretta thought for a few moments. In the 20 years since she'd moved from her mother's boarding house on Green and Fourth, she'd lived in at least a dozen different homes.

"It depends on what your family likes to do," the actress said presently. "San Fernando and the valley are wonderful if you want to keep horses and live in a ranch-type house. Pasadena is a solid community and very accessible to downtown Los Angeles. The Pacific Palisades are dramatic and Beverly Hills has fine schools . . . so there you are."

"Where do you live?" Mrs. Ewing asked.

I sing for St. Jude

by Danny Thomas

The Thomas family link hands in happiness—Danny, Rosemarie, Margaret, Theresa and Tony.

MY BEST SONG SOUNDS ONLY IN MY HEART. GOD ALONE HEARS, BUT ALL MEN JOIN THE CHORUS.

■ Sometimes when I am getting so I think I know all the answers, when arrogance sells me the idea I'm master of all I survey, and all this on the basis of material justification only—meaning I have got hold of a little money, maybe—I hit the bench in church with my knees and a great equalization takes place. Humbleness, which is the only truth we should live in, grips me, and I wince remembering what a peacock I tried to be. I know in my heart that I don't really want anything special. I was a poor boy born into a rich heritage of love and mercy and that is the core of my happiness . . . not anything I acquired later.

I realize today that it was my mother who first showed me what in life had meaning and what was secondary. She used to tell me stories about her home country of Lebanon in which the characters were weighed by only one criterion—they either had hearts and souls or they didn't. She never wasted a word on whether they were rich, poor, powerful or weak. It became clear that this was unimportant, and it has remained clear to me except when ego temporarily clouds my vision. Hers were old fashioned stories and maybe not the kind modern child psychiatrists would approve. But judge for yourself. My favorite was about the murderer who knew that the safest place to hide from the mob was in the home and at the feet of the dead man's father.

"This is the way it is in Lebanon," she would say, "and never has the father failed in his duty to protect because this is the supreme test."

"What test?" I asked the first (Continued on page 67)

BY JIM HENAGHAN

"THERE'S NO SUCH THING AS LOVE!"

■ On the fringe of Hollywood—out where the Sunset Strip begins—there is a small cafe, not much bigger than the average living room, that is called by the odd name of My Own Place. It is the headquarters, office, and bandstand for an enterprising young disk jockey named Larry Finley who sits in the window of the little restaurant until four o'clock in the morning spinning records and commenting on the arrival and departure of the famous. A lot of celebrities patronize My Own Place, for it is the last place a stay-out-later can get into after the saloons and night clubs close at two a.m.

On this particular night the place was jumping as usual at three o'clock. A producer sat near the doorway telling a couple of newspapermen what a great picture he had just made. An actor and a director plotted a future scene on a calico table cloth. And over in a far corner a blonde girl in a mink coat sat and sipped coffee and chatted quietly with a young French actor new to Hollywood. A magazine writer watched them for a few minutes then walked over to their table. He said hello to the girl and then waited for an introduction to the man.

Nobody introduced him; the girl just smiled in amusement and the writer just smiled back at her. It was a game. The girl was (Continued on page 53)

How do they dare print things that are untrue?" She moved around the table in her graceful way, to sit on his lap. "Geordie?"

He took her tousled little head in his hands. "I don't know, honey. Maybe they get their kicks that way. Maybe they gotta turn a fast buck. Maybe . . . Gee, baby, I don't know. It happens all the time. They don't pick just on us."

George Hormel is right in part. It is true that gossip writers have to make a dollar like anyone else. And they certainly don't confine their speculations only to the Hormels. JOYCE HOLDEN's naturally blonde hair isn't easily tamed. Lots of brushing helps to keep it in place.

DEBRA PAGET knows that many men find shoulder-length hair excitingly feminine.

PIPER LAURIE's hair is a color that would have delighted Tiffan. Constant shampooing highlights it.

PIER ANGELI's wavy tresses are something new. Before she came to the U.S.A. she had straight hair!

ANN SHERIDAN's elaborate pampadour is just perfect for this sophisticated actress.

GENE TIERNEY likes this style. It complements any costume her extremely varied social life requires.

JANE POWELL's quick, easy style is kind to her triple role as a wife, a mother and a busy career girl.

CLAUDETTE COLBERT's worn the same bangs and short hairdo since her movie debut, looks lovely in them.

THE MOST BEAUTIFUL HAIR IN THE WORLD

■ There's an old cliché that tells us that a woman is beautiful from "the top of her head to the tip of her toes." Now, MODERN SCREEN is a firm believer in starting at the top, so for the third year it has invited nine beauty experts to select 12 more Hollywood stars to join the royal 24 whose "crowning glories" have already been pronounced "The Most Beautiful Hair In The World."

This year's delectable dozen are: Gene Tierney, Ann Sheridan, Marilyn Monroe, Cyd Charisse, Claudette Colbert, Joyce Holden, Jane Powell, Piper Laurie, Debra Paget, Pier Angeli, Rosemary Clooney, and Ursula Thiess. Some of these top-notchers are old favorites, some brand new arrivals, but they all have one thing in common—a lovely head on their shoulders.

But it wasn't always necessarily so. Some of these shining examples weren't natural-born Goldilocks. They've worked hard to make head-lines. They care for their natural gifts, they experiment on improvements, and they never forget or neglect their hair.

Styling, actually, is the lesser problem. Often the cut is determined by an artist for a particular screen role. Sometimes, when an actress like Claudette Colbert, finds the perfect coiffure, she never allows it to be altered. Sometimes, as recently happened to Anne Baxter, a change for a particular movie creates a happy change of off-screen appearance, too. And many of the younger stars, Debra Paget and Piper Laurie among them, prefer to cut and curl their own.

As for up-keep—each girl has her own special theory: Marilyn Monroe uses brilliantine as protection against the sun; Pier Angeli is convinced that plenty of air keeps her hair healthy; Ursula Thiess never misses a scalp massage. But all of these stars, and those who have gone before, have two gospel rules. Beautiful hair must be clean, clean, clean . . . beautiful hair must be brushed, brushed, brushed. This is where true hair glamor starts for the most pampered star or the girl next door.

The judges who selected these stars were: Nellie Manley, Paramount; Helen Hunt, Columbia; Jean Reilly, Warners; Larry Germain, RKO; Irene Brooks, 20-Fox; Joan St. Oegger, Universal; Bill Tuttle, MGM; Perc Westmore, Westmore Salon; and Myron Nolt of the Beauty Salon, Beverly Wilshire Hotel.

Dale and Jackie's recent marital rift was caused by his inflated ego, said the columnists.

■ "Who's next," asked the Colonel of his aide.
"Sir, it's the Lieutenant with the shattered knee-cap. Dayle LyMoine Robertson, his name is," the Corporal spoke with some awe in his voice. "He's really had it rough, sir. The Lieutenant was with the 332nd Combat Engineers."

That was credential enough for the Colonel. For even safe at home at Fort Bragg, North Carolina, the European exploits of that bunch of heroes was well discussed.

"Knee-cap, hmmm. And with the 332nd. That calls for something special," and the Colonel began riffling through his mind for an assignment for Lt. Robertson that would keep him occupied—and happy—for the time he would linger in Fort Bragg before being discharged.

When Dale Robertson (as he spells his name now) was ushered in to the Commanding Officer's presence, the Colonel knew just how well he'd picked the task for the man. He saw a tall, ruggedly handsome soldier in front of him, and just knew that the guy had a way with the ladies.

That's what the Lieutenant needed for his mission. The choice and challenging assignment was to decorate the walls of the Officers' Club with a dozen or more life-size photographs of fetching females in assorted poses. The Colonel smiled as he gave the order; Dale grinned as he acknowledged it.

Ft. Bragg is located some 12 miles from the city of Fayetteville, and while that municipality boasts many beautiful women, there are precious few professional models within its environs who will pose in nature's garment even for so lofty a purpose (Continued on page 60)

"Sports are important to me," says Dale. "After working six days in a row, I like riding, golfing or hunting on Sunday." But Jackie, left alone with their baby, sometimes ponders which he likes better: sports, or his wife.

BIG STAR, BIG HEAD?

(Continued from page 18) Frog Man. He came back on leave, more than a year later, and one afternoon an old schoolmate of his asked if he wanted to see the local basketball game that night.

"Sure," said Aldo. He'd been through a lot by then but he'd been away actually only a short time, and still knew all the kids on both teams.

"You want to bring a girl friend?" he said.

Aldo grinned. "Sure. And I know which one, if you can fix it for me."

He didn't know it then, but he was referring to his future wife. She was a senior in high school at the time, and he'd known her only casually before he went away. He'd seen her on the street that afternoon and she'd been so gay and friendly that he felt attracted to her right away.

They went to the game together and in the ensuing months he always phoned her for dates when he was home on liberty. He was discharged from the Navy the following spring, and before either of them realized it they were going steady. "She was so cute," says Aldo. "She was so much fun to be with. A real personality girl."

He worked all that summer as a warehouseman at the sugar refinery in Crockett and in the fall started at the University of California on a scholarship. He kept on working at night but found time for dates with his favorite girl. Then he switched to the junior college at Vallejo. It was nearer his home and they would let him play football there; they weren't so fussy about his trick knee. Just before he changed schools he had a blistering argument with his girl. "I can't remember what it was about," he says now. "I guess nobody ever can."

At any rate, Vallejo Junior College saw him going out with other girls and it also saw him as somewhat of a big wheel on the campus. He was a football hero, he got straight A's in all his studies, and he was president of the student body. Aldo Ray had never had it so good.

HE was feeling pretty smug when he went back to Crockett and saw his girl again. It had been a long time and he was flushed with success. "Hello," he said, and she replied with a brief and rather cool greeting. He must have shown his surprise, for a worried little look went across her face then. She said, "I'm sorry. I didn't mean to sound that way. But you see—I'm engaged."

The big wheel of Vallejo Junior College felt his spokes collapsing. Everything had been going so great. He couldn't believe this. At first he thought it was only his pride that was hurt, but in the next few days he realized that it was really his heart. He couldn't stand losing her.

On Christmas Eve he saw her in church at the midnight mass. It was that night that he reached in his coat pocket and showed her the biggest and best engagement ring he'd been able to afford. All is fair in love and war, the saying goes, and some people add politics to that. Aldo was a born politician, and the summation of his strategy was that she broke the engagement a week later and married Aldo the following June.

He was 21 and she was 19, and both of them suffered doubting-pains before the ceremony. His fiancée in particular felt shaky about the whole venture and confided to her friends and family, as well as Aldo, that she didn't feel at all sure. They replied that the uncertainty was universal, that every prospective bride feels the same way. Besides, they pointed out, all the arrangements were made for a big wedding. She couldn't back out now. On Aldo's part, his old gang collectively was giving him the needle. "You're too young," they kept saying. But Aldo felt he knew what he was doing. He loved her and he wanted to be married, so he turned a deaf ear.

The wedding was wonderful. Fully 400 people were there, all people the bride and groom had known all their lives. It was old home week, and it was glamorous and exciting. They went to Del Mar on the California coast for their honeymoon and returned to Crockett to settle down to the business of being married. For a great many married couples this period comes as an anti-climax to the engagement and wedding. And it did with Mr. and Mrs. Ray.

They were both very busy. Aldo went to school during the day and worked at night as a stevedore for the refinery. His bride worked during the day, also at the refinery, and did her housewifely chores at night. They began to have small spats, none of which were serious, but with the disadvantage of youth both of them blew up every argument way out of proportion in their own minds. It never had anything to do with outsiders; the disagreements were always between themselves. They simply weren't adjusting.

Their apartment was small and dingy, and they thought it might help if they found a better place to live. It was the height of the housing shortage, but they did find a place that was more cheerful, another furnished apartment. Aldo began to think that things would work out better and then the night after their first anniversary he came home for "lunch," as the stevedores call their 9 P.M. meal, and found the house empty. No wife, no meal, no note. She came in shortly afterward and gave him her decision point blank. "Aldo, I think we had better not try any longer." She said she had wanted someone like her father, and that Aldo was not at all like him.

SHE left that night and went to live with her parents. For long months afterward Aldo pleaded with her to try again, to make a go of the marriage. It was during this time that Maria DaRe, Aldo's mother, gave birth to her seventh child, and the new baby was the pride of the household. Not long after, Aldo saw his wife walking along the main street of the town.

"Where are you headed for?" he asked. "I'm going to get a soda at the drug-store," she said.

"How about changing your mind and coming over to my house?" He took her hand and held it. "My mother would like to see you, and so would my new brother."

They talked more seriously about their marriage that night than they had ever done. Aldo admitted the mistakes he had made and promised to do better if she would only try again. Both of them felt badly about the idea of divorce, particularly in view of their Catholic faith. Five days later they were back together again, this time in a new apartment with their own furniture. They were trying desperately, and hoped that the common bond of furnishing a home would help.

By this time Aldo, although still in his senior semester at school, was campaigning for the office of constable in Crockett. His wife told him he was too young, that he'd never be elected. Then, soon after their reconciliation, he was given the chance to play a bit part as a football player in Columbia's Saturday's Hero. The $200-a-week salary was a god-send. During the picture's filming Aldo either went up to Crockett for weekends or his wife came to Hollywood. The election took place after the picture was finished, and Aldo won in a landslide. He forgot all about Hollywood and devoted himself to his new duties, but things weren't going well at home. They were both still trying, but it was beginning to be obvious that it wasn't going to work. They were like two puppies trying to pull a dogcart in different directions.

It was decided that a divorce was the only answer and then they discovered they were going to have a baby. It posed a new problem. They had both wanted children and would have been deliriously happy about it had they felt their marriage was on solid ground. As it was, they put up a front to the whole town during the next long months. They were living a sham existence and neither of them was happy about it. A daughter was born to them on July 13, 1951, a baby who came into the world in unfortunate circumstances, for while her parents loved her dearly, they did not love each other. They knew, at the hospital, when they looked at each other over this tiny bundle, that it was all over. If a child, born of both of them, could not bring them together, then nothing could.

THINGS happened fast after that. The very day after his wife and baby had come home Aldo got a phone call from Max Arnow, the casting director at Columbia Studios. Would Aldo be interested in a bit role in a new picture they were going to make? He would. All the bills were paid and he gave his wife a lump sum of money, and then on September 1st he took one last look at his infant daughter and turned away.

In Hollywood, he went on to be the Horatio Alger boy. His success in The Marrying Kind was followed by important roles with Hepburn and Tracy in Pat and Mike and then Ray Milland and Jane Wyman in Let's Do It Again. He kept his nose to the grindstone and was not seen at the bright spots. It is quite possible that he was given advice to be a good boy and stay at home until the divorce was finalized, but it is also possible that Aldo made up his own mind concerning his behavior. In his capacity as a rookie in the industry he has been doused with advice from all sides in both high and low places. But with that political turn of mind he had listened to all the advice and followed only what he considered worthwhile.

He has said that he stayed out of "twosome" mentions in the gossip columns because he felt it was the right thing to do under the circumstances. There was the added fact that he necessarily had to spend the better part of his free time in learning to use the tools of his trade. Aldo's explosive success in Hollywood has been nothing short of phenomenal. In his first year he appeared in strong roles with five Academy Award winners, and it has been no mean chore to turn out performances worthy of the company of these veterans.

Aldo now lives in a modest apartment in the San Fernando Valley. He takes care of the place himself, doing his own cooking, cleaning, and mending. As the eldest of the DaDe family he long ago learned how to take care of a house, and while he considers it no hardship he admits that he does not like living alone. He feels that marriage is the way to live, and that a happy marriage is the epitome of good living.

He is frank to admit he would like to be married again, and feels that a wife is indispensable to a man's happiness and success. He likes to quote an old Chinese proverb that says in effect, "The reason women are never successful in business is because they don't have wives to help them."

He feels that the failure of his first marriage has taught him a great deal and that should he marry again he would know how to be a better husband. He has never claimed that he was the fair-haired partner where the marriage difficulties were concerned and on the contrary has realized his own mistakes. He feels quite strongly about the type of girl he will marry in the future. She must, above all, have faith in him and his ability. She must be his helpmate in his career as well as his home life, by the simple expedient of believing in him. He would like a girl who is positive, who can say "I believe this because—" and give a reason for it. He wants an intelligent girl who is not necessarily pretty. "I'd rather have her be cute," he says. "I don't like women in slacks, but neither do I like them all dolled up all the time. They strike me as being too haughty that way, and not earthy enough." What he means is that he likes a girl who is natural and without affected manners. He notices first about a girl her manner of speaking. If her voice comes out shrill or nasal, or through a wad of chewing gum, he mentally turns his back on her. On the other hand, he can't feel attracted to the type who confine themselves to studied cultural tones in an effort to impress others. "Too much cul-chure I can't take," he says.

He wants a happy medium. "I hope the girl I marry will like to live on a ranch. There's so much security in owning land. You always have chickens and eggs and a couple of porkers, and I think the secure feeling you'd get from a life like that would make for a solid marriage. And I hope she'll like a house with a lot of fireplaces." He wants a second marriage to be a lasting one. "Nobody gets married with the idea of getting divorced later. I couldn't take a second divorce. I'd do my darndest. I'd hate having to leave her to go on tour. I think if I had to be away a long time from a girl I loved I'd just die."

This is Aldo Ray talking of dreams. There is no girl as yet in his life, and even after the divorce was final he didn't rush into a dating spree. He points out that the actresses with whom he has come in contact don't give him much choice. They fall into two separate classes; one group is well established in the business and happily married, and the other consists of the younger starlets who grow hysterically unhappy unless they're flying around town all the time. "I'm no playboy," says Aldo. "I like a girl who says, 'Let's go—let's have fun,' but I don't like the idea of having to see and be seen in the right places. That's their idea of living it up. Me, I don't care where I am as long as I'm having a good time with the girl I'm with."

He has entertained in his apartment—the Southern California football team of which his brother is a member. He has entertained in a restaurant—his brother's friends on the team. There hasn't yet been a romance for the gossip columns, but Aldo is the marrying kind, and in all probability there will be one before long.

LAST November, when he went up to Crockett to watch one of his kid brothers play in a football game, he also saw his ex-wife and baby daughter. It was the first time since he left in the fall of 1951, and by this time the baby was 16 months old. He lost his heart to her and told his friends back in Hollywood, "I wish that everybody in the world could have a baby just like her."

Sitting there talking with his ex-wife and playing with his daughter, it seemed to Aldo that he had never been away—but that was only for the nostalgic moment. Things have tumbled into and out of his life in rapid succession; his two lives, although so totally different, seem to overlap. It has been a deeply unsettling experience, and it will take time to clear his mind and heart of the confusion that lies there now. As Aldo told the girl who had shared three years of his life, "I'm still searching."

"there's no such thing as love"

(Continued from page 42) Lana Turner and she never introduced a new escort. Find out who he was if you cared, but she never tells.

"Well," said the writer after a pause, "tell me this much. Is it love?"

The smile left Lana's face. Her eyes chilled just a little and then she hid them with lowered lashes. "There's no such thing as love," she said.

"You're kidding," said the writer, for there was something in Lana Turner's tone that gave the simple statement a deep meaning.

Lana looked up, her eyes steady now, something almost like defiance in them. "I'm not kidding," she said.

The writer went back to his table to his own coffee and sat and looked into the cup for a long time. This was quite a thing. It was like Louella Parsons saying, "There is no Hollywood." Or Harry Truman saying, "There is no White House." After awhile Lana left. She stood up, wrapped her mink coat closely about her and walked ahead of her date to the door. Just about every eye in the room was on her; she was very beautiful. After she was gone the writer thought about her a good deal more, and finally came to the conclusion that maybe she was right. Maybe there is no such thing as love—for Lana Turner.

Everybody who has any interest in the movies at all knows all about Lana Turner and her loves. They've been publicized better than any other Hollywood commodity. Even her minor loves and the relationships that were just friendships that looked like love. As a matter of fact, it's hard to think about Lana and not think of love at the same time. That might be because Lana is probably the most glamorous of all the stars, the sexiest, the lustiest, the one who looks most like a movie star off-screen; the one who looks most like a femme fatale. And she looks, with those liquid blue eyes and mouth ready for smiling or pouting, like the one who could feel the deepest emotion, particularly love.

Well, she is. And that's why it might be true that there is no such thing as love for Lana Turner anymore.

The past year for Lana Turner has been a bitter one. It has been filled with uncertainty, peeks at happiness and disillusionment, maybe despair. During the past 12 months Lana has lost one husband, sweated out a divorce in anticipation of another, and lost him, too. But it would take more than just these things to bring a gleam of bitterness to Lana Turner's eyes. It has been an accumulation of disappointments over a period of 15 years, starting with puppy loves and running through numerous stabs at something permanent and three marriages. She is now 31. If, as they say, youth is the time for love, it has passed Lana Turner by and she didn't get a prize.

THIS writer has been around during those 15 years of romance. All of them. He's seen Mickey Rooney chase her around the school house at MGM; and Lana, laughing and flushed of face out-running him. He's seen her stare coolly at a Texas millionaire across a crowded room and cut off his enthusiasm without saying a word or averting her eyes. I was in the crew of reporters who took notes at the announcement of her first Hollywood engagement, to her longtime friend Greg Bautzer. And when she was not yet 20 I stood a foot from her in an NBC studio as she told an astonished Artie Shaw that he was once again an educated bachelor. I saw her weep when she got an annulment of her marriage to Steve Crane; and laugh when she got her first public kiss from Bob Topping.

I saw Lana Turner when she was the gayest girl that ever hit a Hollywood night club. The places didn't begin to perk until Lana arrived. And I saw her sitting alone and forlorn at Mocambo one night—the night she left Bob Topping—surrounded by chairs piled on tables, not a spark of fun or joy left in her. Once I got a punch in the nose from a star because he didn't like the way I wrote about a date they'd had at the same night club. I know about it all, and have seen most of it, but I'd say the last year has taken the greatest toll—and Fernando Lamas was the toughest guy to lose. And I could believe that Lana Turner will never again fall in love.

One night ten years ago Lana Turner sat at a ringside table at the Hollywood Palladium with an agent and looked out across the dance floor at a sea of bobbing heads undulating to the rhythm of a famous orchestra. As the dancers passed most of them stared at the stunning star and then moved on, making room for another batch of glancers. Most of the men envied the agent she was sitting with, and all of the girls envied Lana, for she was famous, rich and very beautiful. And Lana watched them in the artificial twilight of the room and noticed the way they held each other and clung together and shared a Saturday night.

"Lucky," she whispered to herself.

"What's that?" asked the agent.

"I said they're lucky," said Lana. "I wish I was in the middle out there with—a guy. Some nice guy of mine."

She hadn't long passed her twenty-first birthday but she was already sadly aware that she'd never have exactly what the rest of the girls of her age had. At least she thought she never could have. Being a movie star, Lana Turner thought that night, has its disadvantages, the main one being the fact that a movie star was the idol of too many men. It wasn't possible for a movie star to dance in the middle of that big floor with just one guy.

Today, you might be able to blame Lana Turner's opinion of love on her attitude that night. I chose to lay the blame at the feet of the men in her life. They, not Hollywood, not fame, not vicious circumstance are to blame.

Take the first one, Mickey Rooney. The Mick, as he was called in those days, was no handsome knight on a white charger, but he thought he was. He raced after the girls like a shaggy toy poodle chasing a pack of great Danes. When Lana Turner came to MGM Mickey was just another pupil in her class room, but he was also the biggest box-office draw in the movies. A girl couldn't discount that, and so when Mickey began to pay her ardent court it was flattering. She will admit today that she liked him—and it can be safely estimated that the reason he didn't get anywhere is that he was over-eager. Maybe if he'd slowed down a bit and hadn't acted like a pyromaniac at a four-alarm fire they'd have gotten along.

DURING this early stage of Lana Turner's love life there were other men. Maybe a better word would be boys. Lana was just learning that life can be full and she was out on the town very nearly every night and used to show up at school with hangovers. The lads and immature men who took her out either sat and drooled or clung and panted, depending on their nerve. And pretty soon Lana wasn't able to figure out just exactly what love was—a state of being, or a sport without rules.

She was about 18 when she first thought she was really in love. The man was Greg Bautzer, her attorney, and, as she herself speaks of him today, the most elusive man in America. Greg was handsome, headed for success and sophisticated. His calm attitude made the other men she had known look like vacuum cleaner salesmen who had been told they were fired if they didn't sell a sweeper before nightfall. This very charm was the cause of the breakup between them a year or so later. Lana, like any woman in love, wanted the fellow of her choice to be ardent. Greg wasn't. She wanted him to talk of marriage once in a while. Greg wouldn't. As a matter of fact, he'd likely run if the word was said. Getting engaged was fine, but that was it.

Lana Turner was carrying around Greg Bautzer's engagement ring when she got married for the first time. Although she has spoken about it a good deal, Lana has never to this day been able to think of a good reason for this first marriage—to Artie Shaw. She says she was not in love with him—and this is believable, because she eloped with him the first night they went out together, right after dinner. It is a matter of record that she didn't kiss him until the justice in Las Vegas told her to.

Just how many of the men she dated she loved, only Lana Turner knows. And she won't tell. But it isn't hard to figure out. I'd say she was in love with Victor Mature. It certainly looked like it. But Mature was in love with Rita Hayworth. He dated Lana plenty, but he didn't want to marry her. Lana was not living only to marry again, but she felt there had to be some other fulfillment to steady dating besides a good time and a kiss goodnight on the door step. That's about all she got from Mature. The thing that made her cancel the whole arrangement was the strong suspicion that he was late-dating after he drove away from her front door. This is a tragic belief to any girl, let alone Lana Turner, movie star and 20-year-old divorcee.

I would say that Lana was in love with Tony Martin. But he was in love with Alice Faye. Tony was as handsome a lad as ever got into the movies. When he danced with a girl he sang the songs that were making him famous, but he sang them softly into her ear. Even if he wasn't in love with the girl he sang to, she had every right to think he was. The man was a charmer who didn't know his own strength. What happened between them is, again, a secret that only Lana and Tony know, but they didn't last much longer than it took for the ink that made the headlines of their engagement to dry. They didn't speak for a long time after.

IT was eight years ago, maybe nine, that Lana Turner met and married the man she says today was the real love of her life. Steve Crane. And Crane was terribly in love with her. Who knows, they might still be married today, except for the blow that came to Lana a few days after her marriage. A young woman from the middle west named Carol Kurtz gave a story to the newspapers that she, and not Lana Turner, was Steve Crane's wife—and she had the documents to bear her claim out. Something serious happened to Lana Turner's belief in love the day she read that story in the papers. She got an annulment; Crane got a divorce; they married again (some say only because she was going to bear Crane's child) and they lived together for a year or more. But something happened when that story broke that couldn't be healed—and again Lana

QUIZZING THE STARS

What do you notice about a man when you first meet him? What attracts you? What is most important to you in a man's character?

AUDREY TOTTER: His smile. His sense of humor attracts me. The most important in his character is his good taste.

SHELLEY WINTERS: Whether he looks alert and intelligent. His personality attracts. Honorable-ness is most important.

Turner was a divorcee. A more bitter divorcee than she had been the first time.

If you'll take a look at the photographs of Lana Turner that have been made since that divorce you'll notice something in Lana's face that wasn't there before. Or possibly the lack of something that had been there before. The eagerness was gone from her eyes. And on her face was a mask of sophistication, a worldly expression that belonged to a woman who might say, "Nuts" if a man told her he loved her.

Lana Turner's marriage to Bob Topping was probably the only really adult romantic situation she had ever been in. It would be a little far-fetched to say it was a marriage of convenience, founded on such dull things as the desire for a home life and roots, but it wouldn't be ridiculous. Topping was a man of the world, a chap who had had his way with women for a long time and was ready to settle down to a respectable family existence. Lana certainly wanted that more than anything else. Yet they were in love, not madly, wildly, but with restraint. They had a love they could analyze and count upon, one that could be handled in time of stress. I don't believe either of them expected it would ever come to an end, mainly because they could inspect it and not ask the impossible of it.

But there came that night at Mocambo when Lana sat alone and knew she couldn't go on any longer, and so she instituted proceedings for a separation.

Fernando Lamas was the first actor (since Mickey Rooney) Lana worked with and liked. Lamas is a strange combination. He is a Latin, with all the charm the word implies, and he is as American as Steve Canyon. On-screen he is the classic South American lover. Off-screen he is a bundle of humor and casual grace. Which facet of this dual personality Lana liked is hard to say, but it is more than likely his off-screen self. They met while they were rehearsing for The Merry Widow. Set workers say they didn't get along at the beginning. That could be because Lana was not in the mood to hold hands with any man—and Lamas looks like a genuine hand-holder. But after a while they enjoyed working together. Later on they liked to spend evenings together.

WHEN they fell in love they made no bones about it. They kept out of the limelight as much as possible at first, because Lana was not divorced and Fernando was in the same boat. It was all right, for they were both separated, but they didn't want too much publicity. Lana hasn't been a very demonstrative girl in public for years, so the reports that they had fallen in love had to be second hand, neither one of them denied it or made excuses, but they made no announcements.

However, those elusive people known as "intimates of both parties" say that they were in the clouds, and after a few months, not concerned with anything but getting divorces and marrying. Lana went to Nevada and established residence for a divorce. So did Fernando's wife, Mrs. Lamas got hers and the papers all carried stories that now Lana would pick up her decree and she and Fernando would tie the knot. But that didn't happen. There were a number of reasons given for Lana not getting her divorce. Most of them seemed to agree, though, that it had to do with a property settlement with Topping. Neither of them confirmed or denied this. But Lana didn't apply for that paper that would have made her eligible.

I saw Lana Turner on the last date she had with Fernando Lamas, and she certainly didn't look like a woman about to fling the ashes of a dead love in her boy friend's face. Nor did he look like a fellow searching for words to tell his doll to get lost. It was at the party Marion Davies gave for Mr. and Mrs. Johnny Ray. I sat at the next table and Lana and Fernando seemed quite happy with one another. Not delirious, but happy.

They have not spent an hour together since that night. Whatever it was that happened was serious, and it happened that night, after they left the party. Nobody seems to know exactly what the quarrel was, but it has put another scar on Lana Turner's heart and a different look in her eyes. That's so apparent that it is easy to say Fernando might have been her biggest love, and possibly her last.

LANA Turner will be a movie queen for a while yet. She has a beauty that will last, the same talent that made her an all-time movie great and an artist in her work these days that can keep her working on sound stages until she's too old to hold a script. See The Bad And The Beautiful and you'll know that. That's what's in store for Lana Turner the actress. What about Lana Turner the woman?

Well, the writer in the all-night cafe where the Sunset Strip begins thought a lot about it over that final cup of coffee. Maybe it will always be like it was that night. A reporter will ask her if it's love, pointing to her date, and she'll say, "There's no such thing as love." And she won't smile after awhile, because she's not kidding.

And then she'll get up and wrap her mink coat about her and go home. And her date, a faceless man who can drive and tell the time, will follow her, a step or two to the rear. And maybe Lana Turner will go home or cry on her pillow. Or sometimes ponder she might have been better off if she'd not been so fleet of foot and had let Mickey Rooney catch her.

(Continued from page 35) he had black hair, brown eyes (with a piece of the sun twinkling in them) and altogether made you think to yourself, "You'd know he was Dennis Day's brother for sure. There is such a strong family resemblance." Having thought it, Ann said it. They talked about it for a while and then they talked about themselves. The doctor (he didn't become "Jim" to her for quite a while, Ann being that formal and respectful!) said he was just getting his private practice under way and hoped to be a busy man. She wished him luck. He also said that just the same, busy or not, he hoped he would be able to see her again and she not only must have wished him luck again . . . but helped to make it true.

Not too often at first, because he soon became one of those doctors who are not in their office because they are wanted at the hospital, and not at the hospital because they are needed at the office. And, of course, no one needs be told that Ann has been one of the busiest girls in Hollywood. Not often at all for the first two years, if the truth be told. The doctor tried, and so did Ann, but when she wasn't working on a new picture the doctor was launching a new baby. This was the period during which Ann was seen one day with this boy and the other day with that one—"this boy" being a Roddy MacDowall or a Dick Contino, and "that one" a Lon McCallister or even Scott Brady. With the exception of Contino these boys were all fleeting dates, and her friendship with Contino was more than the romance it was played up to be by the columnists.

But last summer the tangle of time and duty, which was keeping Ann and her doctor apart, began to unwind a bit. At last, whenever he could catch an evening off there was Ann, ready and waiting. For his they could not only thank their celestial stars, but also a star of a different type, this one of flesh, blood and temperament—too much of all three, as a matter of fact, his studio has complained. You're right! Mario Lanza.

When Signor Lanza decided he'd rather get demerits than be The Student Prince or M-G-M, Ann, who was to be his leading lady, found herself without assignment. Her salary continued but she had nothing to do. While Lanza raved and studio heads cursed she sat quietly by and stuffed her fingers in her ears like a little lady. After some days of this she was told she could wait at home. The situation then became one in which her own studio at the time, Universal-International, didn't play any new role for Ann because she might be called back to MGM any moment if Lanza came back to work. U-I, having loaned Ann to MGM, planned to not pay for her availability even if The Student Prince was shelved—which it was. Ann had already been to Korea, no personal appearance tours were in the offing, or practically the first time in her career she was a lady of leisure . . . and that's when the doctor became "Jim" to her and she began thinking not only of being Ann, but his Ann!

Where did they go? Mostly to shows at night. And when they ran out of shows they lingered longer in dining places and then found an entertainment spot. Whenever there would be an industry thing it would be on Jim's arm that Ann lived and departed. And it was their manner, the way it bespoke the kind of understanding young people can have when they "discover" each other, that first inspired their friends to say they were in love.

When Ann and Jim dance they don't dance Hollywood fashion in which you look around the room to see who else is there and are apparently oblivious of your partner. Their faces are smile to smile, and the smiles are warm and lasting. When they eat out they are quite apt to talk about the art of eating at home, and Jim knows Ann has a working knowledge of the kitchen. She has told him. She has made it plain that she doesn't like the modern kind of kitchen that resembles a sterile operating room in a hospital; she thinks it ought to be one of the warmest rooms in the house where you feel like sitting down and eating what you've cooked there.

Not long ago something happened which indicated that their attachment for each other was nearing the "possessive" stage, which everyone knows comes just before possession is made official at the altar. It didn't seem like much when it happened, but when you started to thinking about it . . . it was quite significant.

JIM took Ann to the Screen Producer's Guild banquet at the Biltmore Bowl and when they entered the hotel a flock of kids waving autograph books surrounded them. Ann signed autograph after autograph, lingering so long that Jim became impatient and finally called a halt. "Come on! Come on!" he said. Ann jumped! She flew to his side and down the stairs they went. The fans who were left behind looked at each other in amazement.

"Geel!" said one girl. "I've seen her with fellows a lot of times and they never dared talk like that if she wanted to go on signing."

"Maybe she wants him to," commented her friend with the air of a deep sage.

The two looked at each other and nodded. So that's the way it was, huh?

Is it that way? "It certainly is," reports Barney McDevitt who handles Dennis Day's public relations and is pretty well up on doings in the McNulty family. "The romance definitely looks serious."

Is it that way? Another McNulty brother (there are five altogether, plus a sister, and all married except Jim), is John, who manages Dennis' business affairs. He, with the caution of a figures-and-facts sort of fellow, is more guarded. "They've a warm friendship for each other and have had for some time," he says.

Well it's true that Jim is busy. He's so busy that he has never had time to get his own apartment since leaving the service, and he still lives in his parents' home. But he's not too busy for romance and he didn't sound at all flabbergasted when queried about Ann and himself the other day. The question appeared to do nothing to spoil the good humor he was in and his reply revealed no surprise at all that such a question should be put to him.

"Are you engaged?" he was asked. "Can you tell me about that?"

"I wouldn't say that," he came back. "Other people seem to know more than we do."

"Well, will you say that you and Ann will be married or engaged soon?" came the next question.

"I don't know," he said. Then he added, reflectively, "She's such a sweet girl."

WHEN he was told that a lot of people think he and Ann would make a fine couple he smiled gratefully. And when he was asked if he thought he could win her he thought it over.

"I don't know whether I'll be that lucky or not," he answered at last. "You see, I'm an obstetrician and my work keeps me on the go. Then, she has her work, too, and opposing schedules like that don't permit us to see too much of each other. We don't get together too often—not as often as I'd like."

But this wasn't all. He had something else to add. Ann was still on his mind and he felt like talking about her. "She's a fine girl," he went on, "I've never heard anybody in Hollywood have a bad word to say about her . . . or even unkind."

Both Ann and Jim are Catholics. Jim's church was in Hollywood and Ann's in the valley near her home. But there is a change now, according to McDevitt. They're both going to Ann's now.

Jim was born in New York. He graduated from New York Medical College, going immediately into the Navy as a lieutenant (jg) and getting his internship while in the service. He is 34, ten years Ann's senior, which makes it perfect as far as her ideas about marriage ages are concerned.

It might not be in error to say that Ann has a partiality for doctors, especially if they are Irish. Shortly after she suffered a compound fracture of the back in a tobogganing accident in the mountains near San Bernadino four years ago she met and liked Dr. Robert Flynn, well known at the Queen of Angeles hospital in Los Angeles. She and Robert used to make up a dating foursome and the man of the other couple practiced medicine too—Dr. Robert Caldwell (he delivered Jane Powell's first baby). He is now married to Joan Leslie.

When the first column item broke about Ann and Jim some of the nurses at the Queen of Angeles hospital didn't get his name, and just understood that she was going with a "doctor." They were sure this could only mean Dr. Flynn. It was not until a "Queen" nurse met a "St. Vincent's" nurse and heard about Dr. Jim McNulty that they got that straight.

The staff at St Vincent's thinks Jim is the salt of the earth but they love to kid him about his romance. It generally comes in the form of congratulations, especially from the nurses, who are solid fans of his. "He's a honey!" said one. "Always the same—just smiles through any crisis," said another. "A jolly one," said a third.

ONE thing becomes certain when you see Ann these days—she is happier than she ever was before. You get no feeling of "Miss Lonely Heart," as she used to be called. If you ask her about the change, the reason she'll give is that now that she has been signed by MGM after having her option dropped at U-I, she is certain to get the kind of singing roles she has always wanted. She loved the opportunity for dramatic acting she got making The World in His Arms with Gregory Peck. But music comes first with Ann in her work. The announcement from her new studio about casting her in the musical, Rose-Marie, set her to dancing about the chances she'll have for singing.

A couple of months ago Ann was asked if she had given any thought to the type of man she liked best. "Yes, a man with quiet strength about him, if you know what I mean," she replied. "Probably one who is a success at whatever he does and liked by those who work with him. This last would mean a lot."

Did she know such a man already? Being Ann she smiled and took a bit of time before answering. "I know a man like that," she said, "but not necessarily the man."

But could he be? Ann looked at a distant corner of the room and nodded at it. And that was all she would do about that question. But it was apparent he could be. Everybody is pretty sure Jim is.

"In view of that," a reporter asked, "is a reconciliation between you and the Prince a distinct possibility?"

Rita didn't have to think a second. "I doubt that very much."

"Isn't your lawyer, Bartley Crum, in Paris right now trying to work out some sort of financial settlement?"

The Princess Khan nodded and made it very plain that she would never seek a divorce from her Mohammedan Romeo until he first made some satisfactory financial arrangement regarding the welfare of their cute, black-eyed, 3-year-old daughter, Yasmin.

"You understand," Rita explained, and there was the slightest touch of a British accent in her intonation, "that I'm not asking anything for myself, absolutely nothing. I feel it's simply my duty as a mother to consider our daughter's future."

The photographers' flash bulbs started popping off. "How about this Spanish nobleman you went around with?" another newsman asked. "Count Villapadierna, something like that?"

The color rose in Rita Hayworth's face. She posed for a few more photographs but declined to answer a single question concerning this dashing new noble Spanish admirer.

AND yet all over Paris and Madrid where they were seen and photographed together, Rita Hayworth and the Count of Villapadierna—full name: Jose Maria Padriena de Villapadierna y Avilla, Erice y Aguado, the man known to cafe society in Paris as "Pepe" Villapadierna—, have been euphemistically termed "an item."

In many quarters, for example, gossip has it that when and if she secures her freedom, Rita will probably take the dashing 40-year-old count as her fourth mate.

One of the leading members of high aristocratic society in Paris told an employee of the French newspaper, Samedi Sair: "It was my impression that the Princess was scheduled to leave for New York late in November. The reason she did not leave Europe until some weeks later, I believe, is because she was very much taken with the companionship of 'Pepe.' He is a very charming man, a very magnetic personality, and very wealthy, too."

"I would never say the Princess and 'Pepe' are in love. They don't have to be. Aly Khan dines with other women, and after all, why shouldn't he? His wife is far away, they are estranged, and Gene Tierney is such a lovely person. I mean if he and the Princess cannot get along. If Rita leaves his flat and comes to the Rue Berri and takes a suite at the Lancaster Hotel, must she spend all her time with her secretary? Is she not entitled to a little masculine companionship? Of course, she is. And what a credit to her taste that she should pick out someone like 'Pepe' Villapadierna."

"He is a widower, you know, and very eligible. He had a most beautiful wife. I met her several times. She died in 1947. I don't want to be premature, but I think 'Pepe' and Rita would make a handsome couple. They both have Spanish blood, that hot, tempestuous Iberian temperament. But, of course, there are complications."

WHEN you talk to Count Villapadierna, you learn what some of these complications are.

To begin with, he is a very good friend of Aly Khan's. "Matter of fact," he says,

"I first met the Princess when she was traveling with Prince Aly through Spain about four years ago. I believe they were on their way to Estoril in Portugal. They'd been recently married and this was in the way of a vacation."

"Prince Aly and I are both very much interested in horses. I'm a member of the Sociedad Hipica. I guess you'd call it the Equestrian Club. And of course, you know about Prince Aly's interest in horse flesh. Both the Prince and Princess are good friends of mine. I'm extremely fond of them both."

"I don't want to get mixed up in any connection with the Princess. Yes, I've seen her. I've escorted her to a few places, but surely, you can understand my position. I don't want any publicity in the connection."

"Yes, I'm single. I'm a widower. My wife passed away five years ago, but that makes no difference. I don't want any unfounded implications concerning the Princess and myself. She's a very charming, a very beautiful, a very brilliant woman, and I don't particularly care to jeopardize our friendship."

"You ask if there's any chance of my

One actress about another: "But she doesn't LOOK 49! Unless you get real close—like 20 feet."

visiting her in the United States. I've never been to the United States, and while I may visit there in the future, in fact, should like to visit there, it would be for the purpose of seeing the entire country and not just one person, if I make myself clear."

"Would I like to see the Princess again in any country? Now, look here, I don't mind giving out information concerning myself, but you place me in a most embarrassing position by constantly referring to your 'Miss Hayworth.' I've already told you that I spent some time with her on her recent trip in France and Spain. I've told you that I spent five years in England, that I'm a land-owner in Spain, yes, that's my occupation, and I've also told you that Prince Aly is one of my dear friends. I've known him a long time, our association is a pleasant one, and it would be ridiculous for me under the circumstances, to say anything connecting me with the Princess except that she and Aly are both good friends, and I shall always be glad to see them."

"You ask how old I am? I'm 40 years old. That's all I'm going to say. I appreciate your courtesy in talking to me. Do I go to the cinema? I go occasionally. Have I ever seen Miss Hayworth in the movies? Look here, I must say goodbye."

If divorce from Aly Khan is an eventual certainty, and even Rita admits it, then it is not unprofitable to mull over the possible identity of the man who will become Rita Hayworth's fourth husband.

In Count Villapadierna, Rita has found a man of character, understanding, wealth, reputation, and stability. But the Count whose title goes back to 1746, would never in a million years dream of giving up his European homestead for an existence in Hollywood where he would be regarded as little more than Rita's consort.

As for Rita, the actress has shown in the past a willingness to abandon Hollywood, her career, her old U. S. friends in favor of the man she loves, but having witnessed life on the Continent with its traditional double standard, one doubts if she would willingly try it again, no matter how respected the Count is.

It is possible, of course, that one day Rita might marry her "Pepe" and settle down with her two daughters, Rebecca and Yasmin, in Paris. The Count has always liked the city on the Seine, has often stayed away from Spain for long periods and conceivably could buy a chateau near Neuilly or Longchamps and commute from Madrid. All this is guess work, of course, because anyone who expects Rita to come out and say frankly, "I'm just wild about Count Villapadierna, I think he would make a wonderful husband. This guy is for me," just doesn't know Hayworth.

BOTH Rita and her Count are, and have been, consistently close-mouthed about their intriguing mutual love-life. That's why MODERN SCREEN, determined to get real facts, followed an old and proven formula: Cherchez la femme! They looked for and discovered a hitherto undisclosed character in this amorous drama—The Other Woman.

MODERN SCREEN found her happily ensconced in a suite in the St. Regis Hotel in New York, three blocks from the Plaza where Rita was staying upon her return from Europe.

French-born Fernanda Montel was the dashing Count's leading lady for four years until Rita entered the picture in Madrid. After calling it quits for good with Prince Aly Khan in Paris, the globe-trotting Rita sought comfort and companionship from Aly's close friend, the millionaire Spanish nobleman-sportsman.

Not willing to play a supporting role to any movie actress, Fernanda picked up her minks, her jewels and her singing career and stormed out of the blond, balding Count's life. She left Madrid where she has a home and flew to New York and a successful singing engagement at the swank Maisonette room. If the French chanteuse sang her torch songs with deeper sadness and more pathos and vibrancy than ever in her throaty voice, she had the Count to thank for inadvertently helping her in her work.

"He didn't leave me. I left him!" Fernanda's long-lashed blue eyes flashed fire as she unleashed her emotions about the no-ac-Count in her life now.

She certainly didn't look like a girl who had been jilted nor does she look like the kind of girl any discerning man would want to jilt. In her 30's, like Rita, she's tall, shapely and sophisticated. Flecks of silver were brushed into her upswept blond hair. Considered one of the best dressed women in Spain, she was exquisitely groomed and gowned in a sleek, chic black Paris frock.

"The Count likes his women well-dressed," she said. "I saw Rita on Fifth Avenue the other day and 'Pepe' wouldn't have liked the way she looked. She was hatless and wore mocassins."

Fernanda tsk-tsked at this. "A movie star should always look glamorous," she said.

LIKE any woman who has just written the end to a love affair, Fernanda wanted to talk about it and also her successor.

"It is funny," she said, "Pepe is Aly's close friend, and I met Pepe through a close friend of his four years ago. We were together ever since. I neglected my career for him because he likes his women to be with him all the time to go to the races, the resorts."

"I met Rita for the first time three years ago at a party the Aga Khan gave after the Grande Prix Race in Paris. The Count's horse won the Grande Prix this year," she said, "I was there with him." Then she added the feminine touch. "He hasn't won a race since I left him."

"Aly is a sweet person and fun to be with, but for me he would not be a good husband. He likes women too much."

"I think Rita gets satisfaction being with Aly's close friend. When she came to Madrid and the Count met her at the tra-

I left him. I was not sharing him. He and Rita went to Seville and Malaga where he has a home and I opened a singing engagement at the Rex Hotel in Madrid. The Count left Rita in Malaga and returned to Madrid. When I heard he was in the hotel and wanted to hear me sing, I told the manager, 'If that man comes inside, I will not sing.' They didn't let him in. I sang and he had to stand outside behind a curtain. I came to New York.

"I wouldn't marry him for a million dollars," she said, "and that is not, how you say, sour grapes. If he did it once, became interested in another woman, he would do it again. I'm through, finished, but he is not through with me.

"He called me up from Spain. I hang up on him. He cabled me. I did not answer. He had our friends write to explain."

To prove her words she went into her bedroom, and after much opening and closing of bureau drawers, returned with a fistful of papers. "See, here are the cables he sent me."

They were dated in November at the time Rita was in Spain.

"It's been a grey, grey, grey day since you left me," one said. "It is all a misunderstanding," said another. Still another wished her well on her opening at the Maisonette Room and the most wistful of all, saying, "We all miss you," was signed with the names of the dog and horse he had given her and his own added lastly, "your Count."

A long handwritten letter from their mutual friend, a Marquesa, pleaded in the count's behalf. "He asked me to write you," the latter read, "and tell you you are the only one that means anything to him. There were women before he met you, but none while he knew you. This 'thing' with Rita is just an adventure."

These words of protestation and affection were all balm to her wounds for no woman worthy of her sex likes to have the man she loves become interested in another. Four years of love cannot be forgotten in four days or even four months.

"I think Rita Hayworth would like to marry the Count. Why not? He's rich and attractive and Rita would be a Countess. She is not as big a star as she used to be. Then she wouldn't have to worry if she were married to the Count."

When asked if she thought the Count would marry Rita, Fernanda, whose command of English sometimes could not keep up with the rapidity of her thoughts, rushed to say, "Why wouldn't he marry her? He's a widower. She's famous and the Count likes publicity. That's his weakness. He has everything else. He's lost without a woman at his side. He likes to be seen with beautiful women."

THAT is the latest, most authentic word from the Continent! A strong conjecture that Rita will become the Countess Villapadierna within a few years.

In Hollywood, however, insiders are still betting on temple-gray Charley Feldman, chief of Famous Artists talent agency. Observers in the movie colony feel that only one factor prevents Rita from going more or less steadily or having some deep understanding concerning her marital future with Charley Feldman and that is her persistent feeling that Charley is still carrying a torch for his ex-wife, the former Jean Howard.

Rita does not want a husband who can't get other women out of his system. She is one in Aly Khan, and the chances are he will not duplicate the feat unless she is to.

What Rita is looking for is a husband who will provide a home and happiness for her and her children without making theappings of motion picture glamor a pre-requisite or an integral part of the marriage. She wants to lead the simple life, a life she has never known, a life of bliss and domesticity, because by nature Rita is a simple, stable young woman and not a sophisticated Continental social butterfly.

Last Spring, she pretty well put the finger on her trouble with Aly when she said, "Various factors, including my husband's extensive social obligations and far-flung interests, unfortunately make it impossible to establish or maintain the kind of home I want and my children need."

A psychologist has suggested the possibility that in each of her previous marriages Rita Hayworth was pursuing a father-image rather than a mate of her own choice. Each of her husbands has been a combination father-teacher-lover, an order not exactly to her liking and from which she has always rebelled.

An intimate of Count Villapadierna says, "One of the reasons Rita likes Pepe so much is that he treats her as an equal. There is never any condescension in his manner. He treats her as if she were born to the purple, as if she always had a title. Unlike Aly he has never seen her in her native bailiwick, that is, working for a living in Hollywood. To him she's always the glamor girl, the fabulous voluptuary. Every girl at one time or an-manages to keep a good share of it.

While she refuses to discuss her financial status, it is no secret that the screen siren was down to her last $50,000 when she returned to Hollywood last year. Affair In Trinidad should net her after taxes, another $250,000 which she can well use since none of her husbands pay her alimony, and she has a large household to support, including Domingo, her faithful housekeeper, Susanne, the French maid, two gardeners, a secretary, and her two daughters.

Rebecca, Rita's oldest daughter by her marriage to Orson Welles, hasn't seen her father in years and was a little broken up when her mother failed to return to Hollywood in time for her eighth birthday.

Rebecca's birthday was December 17th. Rita returned from Europe on December 13th. The little girl thought her mother would fly home and celebrate the occasion with her, but Rita phoned from the Plaza Hotel in New York and explained to her first-born that she had to remain in New York on business and would be home in time to spend Christmas vacation with her.

While in New York, Rita was seen in the company of Raymond Hakim and this gave rise to the rumor that she and the Egyptian-born movie producer had taken other dreams of being treated like a real Princess. It's a projection of the Cinderella neurosis. With Aly, Rita never feels like a Princess. She's the movie star he happened to marry, a show piece for his subjects. With Pepe, however, I think she has the feeling that she is being admired for herself, as a woman, a person, not a screen star."

Before she can return to Europe and her count, Rita, according to her contract at Columbia, must star in a musical version of Rain, the Somerset Maugham classic concerning the South Sea adventures of the prostitute, Sadie Thompson. The musical version of Rain was staged on Broadway with June Havoc several years ago and failed miserably, but Columbia producer Jerry Wald is convinced that with Rita in the lead, the film will make money.

Affair In Trinidad, Rita's first film since her marriage to Aly, was panned by the critics but did very well at the box office. It is possible that her second film, Salome in which she stars opposite Stewart Granger, will do equally well.

Rita has her own producing company, Beckworth Productions, which releases through Columbia, and each time one of her company's films makes money, she a liking to each other. The reason they dined in New York is that Hakim and his brother Andre own the motion picture rights to the life of Isadora Duncan, the great dancer, and the Hakims very much want Rita to star in the film version. Whether or not she will depends on whether the Hakims can get a script written that will meet with her approval.

CAREER-WISE, Rita at this moment, has probably reached her zenith, but the truth of the matter is that she would gladly sacrifice her career if she could only find a husband worthy of the sacrifice.

Her divorce from Aly not yet having been obtained, it is foolhardy to predict, but of all the men in her life, it is safe to say at this point that Count Pepe Villapadierna would probably make her the best husband. People who know him well say that faithfulness is his strong point.

Rita did not give him a month of her time because he happens to be an authority on horses. This relationship between the Princess and her "Pepe" bears close watching, for Volga Haworth Cansino's little girl has never been a female to lead a manless life, not since the tender age of 17, anyway.

he gets what he wants

(Continued from page 44) dandy—Farley will take all the credit. If not—well, okay, he made the mistakes himself and he's ready to shoulder all the blame.

This fetish and flair for independence is responsible for plunging the erstwhile King of the Bobbysoxers into one Yellowstone-geyser cauldron of hot water after another. Even back at the very beginning of things for Farley in 1944, when he was 19 years old and just starting his picture career, he had the knack for stirring up a rumpus.

The powers-that-be in Hollywood called him temperamental and uncooperative. They called him moody and intense, spoiled, selfish, they said he hated Hollywood, a town that had given him everything, and they said he didn't care what difficulties he caused. And you know what? They still say those things!

But there's one person in Hollywood who feels he truly understands the complex Granger mechanism—that person is Ted Loeff, his public relations counsel and friend of long standing.

Because of their intimate business association, Ted has had opportunity to watch and talk with Farley under a variety of circumstances—to study him at close range. As far as Ted is concerned, our boy knows how to live and let live, whether the riding is smooth or the bad-bump detours are many.

As Ted sees it, everyone is confused where Farley is concerned—except Farley himself. He says the boy knows what he wants and how to get it, and that his one-track mind is completely set on a successful career in movies and the legitimate theater. At the moment, Ted says, Farley regards his personal life as unimportant. He implicitly believes that when he reaches the pinnacle career-wise his personal life-pattern will straighten itself out. Then, and only then, will he take time for serious romance.

As he told Ted recently, "The world opened up for me one day not too long ago. I woke up to discover that a career is a job. You have to be like a businessman in the acting profession. You have to work at it, live it, breathe it. You can't do that and run around all night, as I used to do."

Which is indicative of the new Farley. He is determined to make good! Nothing else matters. To accomplish the success he wants above all else, Farley practises tremendous self-discipline. He believes that to keep himself at the peak of performance he must keep physically fit. He is careful of his diet, exercises at least an hour a day, and budgets his time closely, allowing few moments for night club and party tomfoolery.

INASMUCH as Farley admits his tastes are strongly influenced by those of his friends, it's interesting to note just who these friends are. Mostly they're directors, writers, actresses, musicians—sensitive, creative personalities. His own list of his closets friends include Millard Kaufman, the writer, and his wife, Laurie; actress Jo Carol Dennison; Kay Walsh, English actress brought here by MGM to play in Young Bess; actress Jorja Curtright Sheldon and her husband, Sidney, writer-director at MGM; director Vincente Minnelli; director Nick Ray; Norman Panama, writer-director-producer, and his wife, Marsha; Saul Chaplin, composer; Phil Gershe, Farley's agent, and Marvin Friedman, his business manager.

These people are a far cry from the bebop crowd Farley used to chase around with. Even Shelley Winters isn't on the list—so apparently the frenetic days are gone and done with—a closed chapter.

I lunched with Farley in his hilltop home in Hollywood on the very day he was placed on suspension by his boss, Sam Goldwyn, for turning down the starring role opposite Piper Laurie in U-I's Golden Blade. This part had been offered Farley on loanout. It wasn't the first time he had been on studio suspension and, Farley admits, it probably won't be his last.

"After all," he said as Arzie—dear, sorely-missed Arzie!—poured coffee for us and I cast a pleading look at her, only to be spurned, "I'm no idiot. If I don't think a script is right I turn it down. As far as my judgment is concerned, Golden Blade isn't for me, and I'll bet anything you want it turns out I'm right, because they've given the part to Rock Hudson! I don't think Rock and I are the same type at all, do you?"

I said no.

"Then again, maybe I'll be proved wrong," Farley said. "Who knows? All I'm sure of is that I can't lean on the decisions of others. I have to cut my own pattern!"

Now, whether you know it or not, this is an admirable trait in a town where everybody follows advice and, failing to secure what they think is the right counsel, turns to an astrologer. Here's the Granger reasoning:

It's the very bobbysoxers who have made his star shine brightly, Farley feels, who are also responsible for his fanatical fussing over scripts!

He said, "The bobbysoxers are wonderful kids and I challenge anybody to say they're not. Of all people, I should certainly think this about them because they're the ones who put me where I am today.

"But it's these same kids I'm thinking about when I holler about scripts. The young fans were attracted to me because I was young too, and accordingly they identified themselves with me. I don't think they were particularly interested in whether I could act. So—let's face it!—how long can a guy go on being young? Time rolls on for a bobbysoxers' pet just like it does for everyone else, and every year there are new, good-looking fellows like Tab Hunter or gosh knows who—all entering the acting ranks and then my bobbysoxers are off on a new idolatry rampage. I've no fault to find with this scheme of things at all. It's just as it should be. But gee whiz, a guy doesn't want to wind up being an old bobbysox idol!"

This, then, is the reason in back of Farley's intense desire to reach what he calls "the rest of my audience"—in other words, the older fans. He's convinced the only way to reach this adult element of your audiences is through good acting. And this means carefully chosen scripts.

FARLEY thinks it's only the bobbysoxers who are interested in the fact that his hair is dark and curly, his eyes a snapping brown, his smile an impish flicker that sends a gal into a livid, drooling tizzy!

"They don't care if I don't come through with a world-shaking performance," Farley sighs. "My acting ability is only secondary. But their older sisters and brothers and their mothers and dads? That's something else again. They are critical of a performance, period exclamation point!"

"Funny thing about it all is that I didn't start out in pictures consciously catering to the bobbysoxers. In fact, I'm still bewildered that they liked me even a little bit in the heavy, dramatic roles I was playing. There was certainly nothing romantic about my part in North Star, in which I was blinded; about Purple Heart, in which my tongue was cut out; about Rope, in which I was a murderer. Not a romance in the lot!"

This is pretty good analyzing on the part of such a young actor. But then Farley has given the matter of his career in movies plenty of thought this past year. And he has reached the conclusion that in the final analysis he alone must protect it and make it last as long as possible!

No one can do it for him. "I have to know my own self—my mind—and feel what is good for me and what isn't, what I should do and what I shouldn't. I can't take even the words of the producers of my pictures as gospel!"

"I'll tell you the only thing that's sure in this business," he continued, "and that is that nobody does his career a bit of good or adds a day to its life by making a wrong picture. An actor has to keep trying to have his name connected with good movies because most audiences never bother to take into consideration that a picture is bad because it was directed badly or because the script was poor. They simply say, 'I saw that Farley Granger movie and gee, he was lousy in it!' And that's when Farley Granger has to start checking over his accounts.

"So when you hear rumors about my 'temperament' it usually means only that I have rejected a script which, in my judgment, is bad for my career. As far as I'm concerned, I would much rather turn down a story I'm convinced is bad for me and accept the suspension and the loss of a tidy sum of money than refuse to be honest with myself and lose face eventually with my fans.

"One more point: I certainly don't believe in sitting around doing nothing else but waiting, waiting, waiting for that great part to come along. I'm not that unrealistic. I realize as well as the next actor that truly great roles are as scarce as Siamese twins. But my contention is that you have to keep trying not to bog down in mediocrity."

Most of Farley's Hollywood difficulties have stemmed from his passion for honesty and forthrightness, and in being honest and forthright with himself first. He says what he thinks and he tries to do what he thinks is right. Such convictions are not always conducive to the happiness of Hollywood's production heads and directors.

Yet despite all this talk of "temperament," a chat with Alfred Hitchcock, Vincente Minnelli, Nick Ray and any of the other directors with whom Farley Granger has worked during his Hollywood stay brings to light the fact that our boy's professional attitude is exemplary. These directors all try to borrow him for succeeding pictures. Hitchcock, for instance, who directed Rope, liked Farley's work so much that he got him back again for Strangers on A Train.

If Farley is direct in his approach to business problems, he is equally so where romance is concerned. He admits that eventually he hopes to marry and settle down and live happily ever after. But when I asked him when—that all-important question to which you fans await an answer with bated breath!—Farley said:

"I can't give you an honest answer to that question. And I can't understand how other young actors can give interviews in which they say they'll marry when they're 31 years old, or 35, or 39, or whenever! How can they know? How can anyone say he'll definitely wait five years to marry when whammo! he might meet someone tomorrow, fall madly in love and be married within the week? Who can say about a thing like that?"

This doesn't mean Farley doesn't have some definite ideas about romance. He does. For example:

"Nothing irks me more than to have some well-meaning person advise me to beat a steady path to the doors of all the little starlets in Hollywood, to keep the nightclub chairs warm, to go to all the parties—in other words, to make a big point of being seen by producers and directors so that they can spot me and say, 'Oh, there's Farley Granger sitting over at that table—he's just the type we need for our new picture!'"

"I can't see it at all. Why should I have to put on an act to attract the attention of producers and directors? Why should any actor? After all, these men who make our movies are interested only in how I appear and act on film. As a result, it's my opinion that they can pass judgment on me much better by looking at the pictures I have already made than by watching me be myself in a nightclub or at a party."

Farley means that when he goes nightclubbing or partying it's because he feels in the mood for that sort of thing, not because he expects to get anything out of it businesswise. There's that honesty streak again!

And nobody's going to tell him whom to take to the nightclubs or parties, either!

"I used to have a lot of fun with Shelley Winters," he recalled—and somewhat pensively, I thought. "At the time nobody would believe that Shelley and I were seeing each other because we enjoyed each other's company. They coldly chalked it up to a desire for publicity because of Behave Yourself, the picture we were making. But we had been going together for two years before we made that picture!"

"The columnists and the fan magazines said we were so different—that Shelley was the screaming-and-carrying-on type while I was calm and relaxed. They said we had nothing in common. But they were wrong. We really had a great deal in common, and we still do. And it's the same now as it was then: we're both serious about our careers in the same degree—and we go about furthering them in the same way."

"SHELLEY, in her own fashion, has great integrity as an actress. When she's not nervous and tense, she makes an uncommon amount of sense. I understand Shell and what makes her tick, and it never disturbed me during the filming of the picture when she would rant and rave at me. I knew it was simply because of anxiety about the picture and her tremendous desire to make her performance outstanding. I knew, too, that after gulping six doughnuts and four cups of coffee in the dressing room between takes Shell would calm down once again. Physical, that's Shell."

"Being Mrs. Vittorio Gassman has brought much happiness to Shell. She deserves it. We'll always be good friends."

Any current romantic interests? Our boy says:

"I haven't any, really. While making Small Town Girl I discovered what a lot of real fun Ann Miller is and I've been seeing her. You can't call it dating. If you write about it, just say I've been seeing her and enjoying every minute of it."

"It's almost ridiculous, the way columnists, reporters and press agents will ask, 'Who's your new romance, who's the someone special in your life now?'—and I reply, 'Nobody at the moment.' Because they get such a stricken look, almost as if I'd slapped them."

"I just don't happen to be in love at the moment. Which makes me a pretty normal human being, the way I look at it although it doesn't seem to be the way things work in Hollywood. Seems to me that only a neurotic could be madly in love every second, the way the columnists want us to be!"

Farley's plans for the future are jam-packed in his mind. He has many goals set for himself—an outline for a lifetime of self-improvement and self-realization.

First of all, he is determined to mature as an actor, to leap over the hurdle of being considered a bobbysoxers' passing fancy, an offbeat character, and to be accepted instead as a man with real dramatic talent—an actor who can play a variety of roles and create countless characterizations of merit. He hopes eventually to be permitted to work in the legitimate theater and to leave his mark there as well.

He wants to travel. His one European trip—tourist class!—whetted his appetite for more. He likes to learn about people outside the limited Hollywood sphere. Traveling, Farley feels, is good for one's perspective.

And, most of all, but only when he feels he's ready for it, he wants to get married. Does that sound temperamental?

She'll be some gal, too, the one Farley picks, because Farley gets what he goes after. Didn't he take Arzie away from me?

It took several weeks of diligent exploration and research, weeks in which he exercised his charming, winning ways with the opposite sex, but eventually Lieut. Robertson accomplished his mission; and the walls of the Officers' Club were covered with some of the most fetching and provocative blow-ups of the female figure ever recorded by camera.

Two officers who were stationed with Robertson at Ft. Bragg, recently visited the West Coast and were discussing, over a couple of beers, Dale's accomplishments as an interior decorator.

"I wonder why," the first officer said, "Robertson was chosen to line up the girls for those photographs?"

"Are you kidding?" the second officer demanded. "Even back then he looked like a Hollywood character. They say he's gone Hollywood now, but for my money he looked like a matinee idol six years ago."

Whether any actor's "ham" was discernibly latent in Dale Robertson six years ago is beside the point, which is that in the past six months, more and more of the film colony's neutral and objective observers have accused the square-shouldered Oklahoman with the grey-green eyes of going Hollywood.

When Dale quarreled with his wife

Frederica (everyone calls her Jackie although she was christened in France as Frederica Jacqueline Wilson) and moved out of his little stucco palace in Reseda last October, one columnist opined, "Dale Robertson's gone the way of all flesh." "It figures," another said fatalistically. "The only thing about Robertson that success hasn't changed," added a third, "is his Oklahoma drawl."

Although Dale and Jackie have reconciled and are living in harmony, at least temporarily, there are relatively few people who now believe Dale's constant dictum: "I'm in Hollywood for only one reason. I want to get me enough money to buy a horse ranch. After that I'm clearin' out."

Observers refuse to believe that Dale is still the same simple single-purposed youngster who came out to Hollywood five years ago with a disdain of clothes, cars, night-life, and high-powered females.

"Of course he's changed," says an agent who knew Robertson in 1947. "A few weeks ago I saw him in Ciro's with his wife and mother, and I guess his uncle. I saw him three or four nights running. When I first knew him he wouldn't be caught dead in a night club. He spent his nights taking a course in motion picture production down at the University of Southern California. Also he didn't have very much money back then, just what his mother and aunts sent from Oklahoma. Now, 20th Century's just picked up his option. He's making a thousand bucks a week."

"I don't care what anyone says. It's impossible for a youngster to go from nothing a week to a thousand a week and still remain the same. This kid is feelin' his oats. He's bought a new car, some new clothes started living it up a little. Nothing wrong about that. What's wrong is that people thought Dale was a hick to begin with, a country bumpkin who didn't know the score."

"That's all wrong. This kid was pretty sharp even before he set one foot on sound stage. Maybe his accent and his manner fooled a lot of folks; but he never fooled me. I'll give you an example of how sharp this kid's been. Several years ago before he got his break he was reading The Reader's Digest. He came across one of those articles called 'The Most Unforgettable Character I Ever Met.' Was about a convict named Jim Duncan who'd instituted a lot of prison reforms. Dale said to himself that he'd love to play the part of Jim Duncan. He figured that if he bought the screen rights to the article he might be able to sell himself and the story as one package. That shows you how hep this kid was. He knew all about package deals even then."

"Well, he writes to The Reader's Digest and they tell him that the movie rights to the piece have been sold to a Canadian millionaire named Lee Brooks. You think he gives up? Heck, no. He traces this Brooks all over Canada and finally discovers that the guy is right here in Beverly Hills, preparing to make a movie about Jim Duncan."

"Hold on, and I'll show you how smathis kid is. He realizes that he's got to meet this Lee Brooks, only he doesn't know anyone who knows him. He finds out that Brooks has a tailor in Beverly Hills named Armand Brummel. Every single day for a month, Dale goes to this tailor hoping to run into Brooks. After a while it gets so embarrassing he has to order a suit. Finally he meets Brooks in the tailor shop one day and strikes up a conversation. Know what Brooks says to the kid? 'Young fella,' he says, 'I'm making a motion picture about a character named Jim Duncan, and I think you're right for the part.' 'Me?' says Dale. 'Yes,' says Brooks. 'I was thinking about getting Burt Lancaster, but he's tied up. I think you'll do.'

"Not many people know it, but Dale signed a contract with Brooks for $450 a week, only the guy could never get any frozen funds out of Canada, and nothing ever came of the whole shebang. But that'll give you a small idea of what an operator Dale is, so don't you go believing all those stories about him being the yokel whose head was turned by success.

"Dale Robertson has always been as sharp as a razor blade, only in a nice, friendly, rural, horse-trading way."

That's one man's opinion about Dale Robertson. Listen to a young woman who writes personality pieces for many of the movie magazines.

"PUBLICITY-WISE," she says, "I think Dale is one of the most uncooperative young actors in Hollywood. I don't know if he's suffering from a swelled head or what, but he sure has some wrong ideas about this business. I got the impression after interviewing him that he thought he was doing me a very great favor.

"When he was relatively unknown he didn't mind sitting for interviews and answering questions, but now he's come to the peculiar conclusion that if the fans read too much about him they'll become tired of him. 'I've done my share of interviews for the year,' he told me. 'I'm just not gonna do any more. I went to New York and I can't tell you how many editors I saw. I saw everyone and his grandmother. I've talked myself out. I think you've got to be sensible about this publicity. People see you every time they open a magazine, and right away they're fed up with you.'

"As a result of this sort of thinking, Robertson is a very difficult young actor to contact. Ask anybody who works in the publicity department at his studio. They'll tell you he's a wonderful fellow, but just you try to make a date to see him. It's easier to see Eisenhower. I realize that being questioned day after day is no picnic, especially for someone with Robertson's laconic temperament. But Dale's a pig boy. He should realize that it's part of the game, and he should be happy. The time for him to worry is when we stop asking for interviews. Someone should wise him up to the fact that only one thing has made him a star, and let's face it, as an actor he's—well—no threat to Spencer Tracy. He's a star primarily because of the public demand for his pleasing personality. If he won't cater to the ticket-buying public, no matter how outrageous its demands, they'll drop him in favor of someone else. There's nothing as tickle as the public. A little thing can turn it sour in a second.

"Look at Farley Granger. He's a great ase in point. Farley was scooting along t swift pace until he got a little too big or his britches and decided to cut down n his interviews. Here's a kid who isn't married, who's got plenty of time, but he ist can't be bothered. What happened? 'he bobby soxers started to desert him.

You don't see Tony Curtis making it difficult for magazine writers. He knows how much we helped him. He admits it frankly, and that's why we give him and Janet a break every chance we get.

"As for Dale, he's the kind of actor who draws the line. He'll go so far and no farther, wants to protect his privacy and all of that. Public figures don't have any privacy and the sooner he learns that the better off he'll be. I know I sound like a bitter, frustrated woman, but I'm not really.

"It's just that I'm so disillusioned in some of these young actors. They come to you for publicity when they're on the way up and when they're on the way down. When they're in between, when they've finally reached a certain level, when they've just had an option picked up, they're all so darn busy you'd think they were running General Motors."

IN ALL fairness to Robertson, it must be said that he has sat for more interviews and portraits in the past year than any other star on the 20th Century lot with the possible exception of Marilyn Monroe. He has made a dozen pictures in the past two years with practically no time off. He has participated in scads of benefits and charity functions. He has made shorts for the Red Feather community chest drives, organized ball games for charity, driven thousands of miles to exploit studio product. He has never turned down a script, argued with a director, or fought with the front office.

It so happens that at this moment he feels strongly that the press hasn't treated him too kindly, and in a way he's right.

"I got along with every single reporter," he says. "In every interview I did my level best. I posed for pictures, answered all their questions, cooperated in every way. Okay? What happened? A reporter calls up John Carroll one afternoon and finds out I'm staying there. He asks me what I'm doin' there, an' like a fool I tell him the truth. I tell him Jackie and I, we've had a quarrel. Next day it's blasted all over the papers. Next thing you know everyone's writin' that I've become big-headed, too good for my wife, all of that junk.

"Nobody writes that all married couples quarrel, that we'll probably be back together in a few days. Right away it's a big thing, and I'm the heavy. I was slaughtered. A few days later everything's okay. Jackie and I are back together, but by then the damage was done. I haven't changed. I'm workin' harder and earnin' more money, but this nonsense about my head gettin' bigger—well, that's what it is—nonsense. I've just had a few lucky breaks, and I know it."

Dale always had plenty of confidence. He was always certain that he could make a go of it in Hollywood, that one day he would become a full-fledged screen star. He was convinced from the very outset that "anyone can become a movie actor. It just takes effort." In his own success he's proven that point.

Dale never went to a drama school, never had any training in dramatics. He made the jump to Hollywood right from the Army.

When he succeeded in reaching the big time, he refused at first to alter his scale of living. He hired no press agent, moved into no large hotel, ran up no large clothing accounts, purchased no Cadillac convertible, organized no Santa Monica co-ed cult. Instead he continued to live in his G.I. house in Reseda (where he pays less than $60 a month rent and utilities included), stay out of night clubs, adhere to a strict regimen of work and more work. Whereupon people began to say, "Isn't Dale wonderful. Here's a simple guy from an Oklahoma farm with the hayseed still in his hair. He doesn't chase around after girls. He doesn't play the Peter Lawford circuit. He isn't a clothes horse. He hasn't changed one bit. Just wants to earn enough money to get back to the land. What a refreshing contrast!"

In short, Dale Robertson was assessed as a simple, honest, uncomplicated, rugged American—a young Gary Cooper from the backwoods, a chip off the old log cabin.

There were a few things wrong with that evaluation. First-off, Dale was never as a simple, honest, uncomplicated, rugged who didn't know him made out. Second, he wasn't a farm-boy at all. He was raised in Oklahoma City where he'd attended the Eugene Field Grade School, Roosevelt Junior High, and Classes High. He'd also been graduated from Oklahoma Military College at Claremore. Thirdly, insofar as women were concerned, he'd been unsuccessfully married at an early age. A divorce had followed; and he wasn't too anxious to try marriage again. Fourthly, his mother and two maiden aunts were staking him in Hollywood, sending him checks of $250-$350 each month, and his conservative expenditures were more of a necessity under the circumstances than his own personal predilection.

In short, the movie colony was completely wrong about Dale by the time he achieved success. Now, when you are wrong in this plaster Athens, when you have judged incorrectly, you assuage your misjudgment by one of two methods: you either perpetuate the legend you've created as in the fiction of Gary Cooper (he's supposed to be a shy, diffident, bumbling, trusting rural backwoodsman, where in reality he is a shrewd, razor-sharp socialite) or you say, "My! But that Dale Robertson has gone Hollywood." The implication being that he has changed far beyond your original and incorrect evaluation.

As Dale himself realizes, this "going Hollywood" accusation began as a result of his temporary separation from his wife. Dale and Jackie were married after a courtship which lasted less than a month. They met at a party given by Andre Hakim, a studio producer, and a few dates later, on May 19th, 1951 they were married.

Whenever an engagement is consummated in marriage that quickly, the man and wife have to spend a good deal of time in getting to know each other. Unfortunately, Dale was hard at work, there was no time for a honeymoon, not even too much time to get really acquainted, and yet these two were married and living under the same roof.

Had Jackie gone with Dale, say for a year before they were married, she might have learned many revealing aspects of his background and character. For example, Dale is the child of divorced parents. He was raised by his mother and two aunts. One boy raised by three women is almost certain to be a little overdemanding, a little hard on his wife.

Jackie might also have learned that most of Dale's youth was devoted to athletics. As he himself says, "I've been athletic all my life. Sports are important to me."

When a husband works six days a week as Dale does, his wife naturally expects him to spend the seventh day at home. This is a normal expectation, only Jackie discovered after her marriage, that it was rarely fulfilled. Dale believes strongly that so long as he spends six nights a week at home, it's okay to devote Sundays to sports, with or without his mate.

He is also on record as saying that, "every husband should have one weekend off a month to go fishing or hunting."

Jackie Robertson has never complained about her marriage to Dale. But people who became aware of his great interest in athletics, his insistence upon devoting some time to himself started the rumor that Dale had gone Hollywood, that his poor little wife had become a golf widow, a baseball widow, a soft ball widow.

The basic truth, and Jackie has found it out, is that a man like Dale must be accepted on his own terms, that the essential fabric of his ways was already woven at the time of his marriage, that any attempt to change him must end in certain marital disaster, for Dale is one of those free souls who all his life has wanted to grow up to be the strong, silent man of the West, and now that he is in a position to actuate what was originally a dormant sublimation in his adolescence, there is no stopping him. He will buy his horses, train his dogs, go off on hunting trips, shoot his golf, hit his baseballs, and lead the healthy outdoor life. His spare time to him is his own and rarest possession.

Luckily for Jackie, she now has a little daughter, Rochelle, on whom to dote and spend her vast reservoir of energy; so that she no longer misses Dale so acutely, and the chances of a marital rupture over the question of time proportionment have become progressively slimmer.

Jackie, although she is only 20, is also realizing what her husband belatedly has come to accept—that the price of screen fame is responsibility, not only to the studio but to the public as well.

Dale Robertson's contract has another four years to run at which time he should be earning $5,000 a week. He has a business manager, Morgan Maree, who keeps him on a strict allowance of less than $20 a week spending money, but Dale still buys horses and has the bills sent to Morgan. He still insists that when his contract is finished, he'll retire to a horse ranch in Oklahoma. But somehow no one in Hollywood takes him seriously any more.

THE armor of his unsusceptibility to temptation has been pierced. He has not gone Hollywood in the sense that he has forgotten old friends, become a yes-man or a play-boy, or started to cultivate the social game. There is not a snobbish bone in his whole body; he is still as honest, forthright, and outspoken as they come; and he still detests people who attempt to climb the social ladder lie by lie.

Perhaps that's why his attitude is so frequently misunderstood. He himself is too honest to pretend he doesn't like fame, adoration, and the admiration of the world. He won't play down his belief in his talent, or check-rein his imagination. He won't feign indifference to his handsome salary, and the comforts, respect and power it can buy.

Dale's got it good, and he knows it. Maybe he shows it too much—and is fair game for the sharpshooters of Hollywood. Remember, though, it was only two years ago that Dale Robertson was jet-propelled into stardom. It takes time to regain one's balance after such a sky-rocketing experience. And many a kid who's got his growth too fast, has eventually grown up to his hands and feet, has filled out his shoulders, and in time faces the world a full-fledged man.

older wives—young husbands

(Continued from page 31) to give her boy a chance to prove it. Moreover when she starred at Metro in My Man And I, she saw to it that Vittorio met the right people, only those who might do him the most good. In this case, too, her industry resulted in a contract for her sweetheart. Vittorio, as you all know, married Shelley. Will Ginger Rogers marry her Jacques, a man young enough to be her son? Certainly, the Frenchman is willing, but Ginger has some doubts. Her intimates in Hollywood have even more. Their attitude is negative on two counts: first that the marriage will never come off; secondly that if the wedding does take place a divorce will soon follow.

She went through very much this same routine during World War II when after six dates, she married Bonita Granville's former boyfriend, Jack Briggs. An RKO actor stationed with the Marines in San Diego, Briggs was 24 at the time Ginger decided she simply must have this handsome hunk of masculinity in marriage. She was almost ten years older than Jack, and many friends warned against the marriage, pointing out that once the physical passion subsided, these two might prove incompatible. But Ginger wouldn't listen. She and Jack were married in January, 1943. It lasted six years.

Briggs, who is 6 feet 1, weighs 190 lbs., has dark brown hair, brown eyes—Ginger goes in for the tall, dark, and handsome type—had little luck in his screen career once the war was over. He acted in My Forbidden Past with Ava Gardner and Robert Mitchum and was then released.

Despite Ginger's influence few other jobs were offered to him, and the marriage began coming apart at the seams. Following the divorce, Ginger started to date Greg Bautzer who knows how to avoid marriage as a fox avoids the hounds.

Today Jack Briggs lives in San Diego, works in radio and TV, and hasn't the slightest desire of returning to Hollywood or marrying an actress ten years his senior, no matter how great her wealth or influence. With Jacques de Bergerac, however, it's another story. The French have different ideas about wealth, marriage, influence, and the role of a woman.

How long such a marriage would survive few persons care to predict. When there is a differential in age of at least 15 years, the chances don't seem too good. Greer Garson is qualified to testify on that point. During the war she married Richard Ney who played her son in Mrs. Miniver. She was at least 15 years older than Ney at the time, but she was very much in love with him. He was in the Navy; there was her great fear that she might lose him forever; so the only recourse, she felt, was immediate marriage.

WHEN an actress who has arrived marries a young actor who hasn't, when the actress is in effect the family breadwinner and her husband the consort, such marriages have no staying power. The young husband resents the old wife for her success, for the loss of his own self-respect, and whatever love or mutual admiration there was in the beginning makes a quick exit.

Greer Garson was smart enough to see the folly of her marital ways; and for her third try she made it a point to take as a husband a successful rancher millionaire who is older than she is, Buddy Fogelson. Greer is officially listed as being 44. Fogelson is in his 50's.

One of the reasons Joan Crawford, who is also 44, is chary about another marriage—it would be her fourth—is that there are few eligible men around Hollywood in the 45 to 55 age-bracket. Joan's third husband, Phil Terry, was three years younger than Joan and another case in point where the younger husband lacked the older wife's drive, ambition, and positive sense of achievement. When Joan married Phil he was a young actor trying to climb the rungs of the success ladder. A competent actor, he did extremely well opposite Ray Milland in The Lost Weekend, but after that, he found good parts progressively scarce.

Joan used her contacts in an effort to get him work, but Terry simply didn't have what it takes. Crawford, who is self-reliant, independent, and basically domineering, the result of her self-made success, is not a particularly easy woman to live with.

Terry felt it was unmanly to play second fiddle in the lavish Crawford household. There was only one answer, divorce.

Ann Sothorn and Robert Sterling found the same answer to their marital dilemma. Ann is 42. Sterling is around 37. In 1944 when they got married, Ann felt strongly that the age differential would make absolutely no difference in the success or failure of their marriage. The same old pattern went into effect. Ann was an established success. Her husband was not. She earned five times as much money as he did. Sterling tried to get a big break. No luck. When they went to previews, the fans recognized Ann, identified him as only her husband. Such slights hurt a man's vanity. He hates to be less successful than his wife. Such a set-up is essentially antagonistic to the male ego. Two years ago Sothorn and Sterling called it quits.

A HOLLYWOOD society matron who has been in the movie colony since Cecil B. DeMille first arrived almost 40 years ago, told me recently that there has never been a successful marriage between an established screen actress who was older than her unestablished husband.

"Let Ginger Rogers marry this de Bergerac fellow," the matron said, "it won't last very long. Unfortunately, I feel the same way about Jane Wyman's marriage to Fred Karger. I know Freddie fairly well. That is, I've seen him around various functions leading his little orchestra from time to time. I think he's a year or two younger than Jane, although I may be wrong. Compared to her he's relatively unknown. Here we have an actress at the peak of her powers marrying a kind but average musician. The discrepancy in accomplishment is too great. Why Jane married Freddie so quickly I don't know. I've been told that it's a question of rebound from the Bautzer affair. Maybe it is and maybe it isn't, but I just don't think it is the last marriage for either of them.

"I have never seen marriages in Hollywood where the woman is a good deal older than the man. Take Norma Shearer as an example. She claims she was 38 when her husband, Marty Arrouge, was 29. I happen to know that Norma was born in Canada in 1904. This makes her 48 years old. Actually, she looks less than 40. I believe she looks so well because she has a young husband. Marty was a ski instructor when she married him. He had no acting aspirations whatever. He was content to marry Norma and share her millions. They travel all over the world together. They are very simpatico. I know nothing about their money arrangements, but there is no career rivalry to bedevil their relationship.

"That's where these older actresses make a big mistake. They marry young actors who want to reach the heights. They believe that these young men are more tractable than husbands of their own age or older. They feel that they can use these young boys. On the other hand the young boys feel they can use the older actress. There is no love in such a match, only utility.

"If women like Ginger Rogers and Joan Crawford and Ann Sothorn and others of that group want to preserve the illusion of youth by marrying young men, they should choose men who have no show business aspirations or who are finished with such aspirations.

"Look at Buddy Rogers and Mary Pickford. Mary must be 60. Buddy is approaching 50. Why do these two get on so famously? There is no career rivalry. These two have had their share of fame. Mary looks wonderful because Buddy's youth stimulates her. She can't afford to get fat and frowzy.

"Rosalind Russell is older than her husband Freddie Brisson. But Freddie isn't any actor. He doesn't mind walking in the shadow of Rosalind's limelight. He acts as her producer, her general manager. She has the talent, and he oversees it. He doesn't mind occupying a subsidiary role in the setup. Most men do. They will put up with it only as long as they have to. Certainly that was true of Clark Gable and his first two wives. He married Josephine Dillon, the drama coach, when he was down on his luck. When things picked up he went over to Ria Langham. Ria occupied a position of prominence in Houston. It didn't matter to Clark that these women were older, much older than he was. As soon as success came his way, he pulled out of these marriages. Of course, Ria made him pay plenty. After all she'd given up an awful lot to become his wife; but when an older woman who has only money marries an ambitious young man who hasn't any, she must expect to be discarded when his ship comes in."

IN Hollywood there have occasionally been great passion-ridden, tempestuous love affairs in which the love element was so overpowering, so pervasive, so dominant that the relative ages of the partners were scarcely given a second thought at the time of marriage.

There have been four such affairs: Robert Taylor and Barbara Stanwyck, Alan Ladd and Sue Carol, Jerry Lewis and Patti Palmer, Lucille Ball and Desi Arnaz.

Barbara is five years older than Taylor, Sue is two years older than Allan, Patti

Absent Minded Rex

Rex Harrison plays tennis on a court that belongs to his friend Douglas Fairbanks, Jr. Occasionally his wife is confronted by a bewildered husband who remarks that he seems to have lost a lot of trousers somewhere. She knows just where to look for them. Sighing, she drives to the Fairbanks home. After tennis, Rex, Doug, Jr., and their athletically inclined friends retire to a steam bath Fairbanks has built near his court, and when Harrison finishes parboiling himself, he is likely to climb absent-mindedly into a pair of flannels belonging to Fairbanks. His wife has fetched home whole armloads of his trousers, as well as shirts and sweaters.

PETE MARTIN—"HOLLYWOOD WITHOUT MAKEUP" is two years older than Jerry, and Lucille is six years older than Desi; and in three of these four marriages, it is the wife's age advantage which has given the marriage a degree of stability, security, and understanding which otherwise might be lacking.

The one exception to this statement is the Barbara Stanwyck-Robert Taylor marriage. I believe the failure of that marriage may be attributed directly to the age differential. Taylor was in his 20's when he began going steadily with Barbara. At the time she was still married although separated from her first husband, Frank Fay. Her life with Fay, she later testified in court, had been extremely miserable. She had tried to prevent him from seeing their adopted son, Dion. She had accused him of boozing it up and manhandling her from time to time, and the only ray of light in her existence had been with Taylor.

WHEN her divorce from Fay was granted, Barbara rode off with young Taylor and was married. It was an ideal love match. No one said anything about Barbara's age, but the truth of the matter was that Taylor had never had his fling. He was too young, too inexperienced for Barbara.

After the war and still a young man, he became an aviation enthusiast. Barbara refused to go flying with him. She preferred to remain in Hollywood and work. Although she has looked and continues to look much younger than her age, she adopted the philosophy of a middle-aged woman, the stay-at-home behavior pattern which Taylor rebelled against.

Each time the opportunity presented itself for him to make a film overseas he grabbed at it. He's made more films abroad for MGM than practically any other actor on the lot. While Taylor was in Rome, starring in Quo Vadis, I began hearing many stories about him and the Italian actress, Lia de Leo, who is currently threatening to sue Taylor for breach of promise. Barbara Stanwyck heard the same rumors. By then it was too late. Taylor had decided to have his fling before he grew too old, a fling denied him in his youth. He asked Barbara for his freedom, and being the kind of generous, understanding woman she is, she granted it readily. Taylor gave up his rights to their $100,000 home which she quickly sold, and promised her 15% of his gross earnings until her death or remarriage. He then began playing the field which is what he is currently doing with Ursula Thiess, Pat Tiernan, Yvonne de Carlo, Ludmilla Tcherina, Jean MacDonald, and whatever female talent comes into his ken.

Had Bob Taylor played the field extensively before his marriage to Stanwyck, had he dated dozens of girls instead of concentrating on Barbara and his work, the chances are that he would never have had the desire for a freedom he now finds singularly unrewarding. In Barbara Stanwyck he married a woman whose rate of growth because of the age factor was much faster than his.

In some cases this is a good thing. Take the Lucille Ball-Desi Arnaz marriage. Everyone predicted that this one would last a fast 90 days. Not only was Lucille six years older than her Latin lover, she was eminently successful, and he was not, at least in motion pictures. In order to make a living, Desi had to be out on the road most of the time. Conscious of her age, Lucille used to imagine what her lost wives imagine when their husbands are on the road. It wasn't long before Desi and Lucille separated. It was then that Lucille's maturity came into play.

"I knew," she has since confessed, "that if we both stopped being trigger-tempered and really worked at the marriage, we could make a go of it." Had Lucille been as young and impetuous as Desi, the marriage would have been ended right then and there. Instead, Lucille suggested that they try it again. Both soft-pedaled their tempers and then two years ago, rather than have their separate careers keep them apart, decided to pool what money they had on a series of TV films to be entitled I LOVE LUCY.

Many friends in show business told Lucille that she had rocks in her head, that she might be saving her marriage, but would be ruining her bank account. Lucille paid no heed. She and Desi went ahead with their plans. "We decided," she says, "that instead of divorce lawyers profiting from our mistakes, we'd profit from them." And they have, too. Lucy has coined money and brought new stability to the Arnaz household, and this newly secure union has been blessed with one child, and another is on the way.

Patti Palmer, Jerry Lewis' wife, is another girl who has used her edge in years in an attempt to stabilize her husband, an almost impossible task with Lewis. Jerry, for example, never would go to bed unless he had a loaded revolver under his pillow. This was an offshoot of the insecurity and loneliness he felt as an adolescent when his parents, vaudevillians, would leave him alone at night while they entertained in neighborhood clubs for a few dollars. One afternoon when he was in his teens, Jerry walked into a pawn shop in New Jersey and bought a revolver. He slept with it each night because it made him feel secure. It was only a few weeks ago that Patti convinced him to give it up.

As a matter of fact as recently as a year ago, Jerry was afraid of entering any of the well-known restaurants in Hollywood unless he knew someone inside. He refused to attend parties unless his sidekicks went along. He was fearful of any sort of social life not in line with his Borscht Circuit upbringing. Patti has changed all that without nullifying his wild, slapstick spontaneity. She knows very well how to act as a straight man for his various routines.

A few evenings before they left for the Texas State Fair last October, Jerry and Patti were strolling along Wilshire Boulevard in Los Angeles. Suddenly, as they approached a crowded intersection, the 26-year-old Lewis turned on his attractive little wife.

"Now you get away from me," he screamed. "I don't care how much you're asking. The answer is no."

"Please, Jerry," Patti protested, playing it straight. "People are looking."

"How dare you attack me?" Lewis demanded. "Get away from me before I call the police."

Pedestrians began gathering around the couple. "You should be ashamed of yourself," Jerry shouted, wagging his index finger at Patti's poodle cut. "A nice clean-living boy like me." He crossed his eyes and stuck out his tongue. Then indignantly he whirled upon the crowd. "Come on, now," he bellowed, brandishing an imaginary nightstick. "Beat it. Break it up. This dame stole my watch. I'll run her in." And with that he grabbed Patti under the arm and hustled her down the street as the crowd roared.

If Patti were younger than Jerry—they were married when he was 18—she would certainly be incapable of handling this mercurial, talented, zany neurotic.

She is as perfect for him as Sue Carol is for Alan Ladd, and these two are the last word in perfect mating. When Sue first met Alan she told him quickly that she was two years older than he was. She'd been married twice before. She'd had a successful motion picture career, a child by a previous marriage, and she was running a talent agency because she knew the motion picture business from A to Z.

Ladd at the time was a monumental failure, but he had enough common sense to put both his head and his heart, figuratively speaking, in Sue's capable hands. She really went to work for her man. She started him in at Paramount on This Gun For Hire at $150 a week. That was in 1942. A few weeks later she married him, loving the frightened young man from Arkansas, mothering him, protecting him, guiding his career, watching over his money, educating him to the ways of the big time.

Today, some ten years later, Alan Ladd receives $100,000 and up per picture, plus a share of the profits. He owns the Alsupana Ranch, 25 acres worth $150,000, a Holmby Hills mansion worth another $200,000, and what is best, doesn't have to bother about taxes, contracts, details, or expenses. Sue sees to everything.

If Alan Ladd were older than his wife he might resent her pre-emption of the ordinarily masculine domain of the household, but under the present setup, he's only too happy to let Sue take over.

"Let's face it," he says. "She knows more about finances and money than I'll ever know."

It was Sue, for example, who saw the wisdom in their going over to Europe for a year and a half. If the Ladds remain abroad 18 months they will have to pay no tax on their income. In a year and a half abroad, Alan can earn more money and keep it than he could in the U. S. A. in ten years. In the Ladd setup, Alan is the breadwinner and Sue is the banker, and each loves the other for his virtues.

WHAT conclusions may be reached from this study of Hollywood wives who are older than their husbands?

One almost inescapable conclusion is that older actresses should not marry younger actors. Annabella lost Ty Power, Barbara Stanwyck lost Robert Taylor, Joan Crawford lost Phil Terry, Ann Southern lost Robert Sterling, Greer Garson lost Richard Ney, and so on down the line, one of the few exceptions being Lucille Ball and Desi Arnaz, and Desi wasn't really an actor when Lucille married him. Gary Merrill and Bette Davis constitute another exception. But in this one it's really too early to tell.

Actors, however, are wise in pursuing Benjamin Franklin's advice, just so long as the older girls they marry are not actresses. Somehow actresses are not particularly appreciative of younger husbands when they themselves have to pay most of the bills.

"God's test of love and mercy," she replied.

"What do you get if you pass?" I wanted to know.

"His love and mercy," she told me.

We lived in a part of Toledo, Ohio, that people in other parts stayed away from if they could. We were many families, of all religions, who filled those big, dilapidated houses on the edge of the downtown business district. You have seen houses like this in your city probably, cut up into small apartments, yet with rooms strangely large. In our dining room you could play basketball, and it was all right to play basketball because our folks could never afford to furnish it. Yet whenever there was an occasion for a holiday or a feast somehow something good would happen about it. Broke or not we could celebrate, because the mothers all saw to it. For instance they would all exchange dishes. There were holidays in which we ate Polish dishes, Italian or Irish. There were high Catholic Fridays when we had nothing to cook, yet a neighbor would see to it that we got our fish . . . gefulte fish. So much warmth we had, we whom the rest of the city thought were such a wretched group, that whenever I got a cold look from some rich kid I used to wonder whether it was because none was left for him and his kind.

ACTUALLY we never saw the really rich.

A rich man to us was anyone who had a steady job. We were so poor that none of us ever had the attention of a family doctor; mother, father, eight brothers and a sister, we got treatment only in the public clinic where you had to sit around so long you often forgot what ailed you. Clothes? By the time a pair of pants came down the line to me from my older brothers it was always short a very important part; I didn't dare turn my back to anyone. In fact, in winter time I learned to face the wind—like cattle do—to keep from getting "keel-froze." My brothers and I worked through our play ages. In order to earn as much as 30 cents selling newspapers, I had to take a chance of being mobbed and robbed by other kids—and I was mobbed and robbed.

One of my favorite memories of that period centers about a mackinaw coat which belonged to my brother, Bill. In the daytime he wore it to work. At night he stuffed it into a broken window pane to keep out the winter. One night it was so cold that when he put on his coat in the morning the part that had been exposed all night was frozen solid. We all laughed because Bill looked as if he had a hump on his back when he left for his job that morning.

Yet, when there wasn't much food in our house, there was always love and mercy. When there wasn't enough heat, there was love and mercy. When there wasn't anything to support us in goods of the world, there was always the strength of our faith which at first came to us from our mother, and then, when we got older and learned for ourselves, direct from where she got it—the church. To the church I have gone since that time. To the church I will go for the rest of my time . . . and beyond.

It should not be thought that we kids were not often tempted from the straight path. We were more than once. Standing in the corner grocery store waiting for the old proprietor to cut me ten cents worth of lard, I used to let my hands stray. They would pick up an egg or two, cookies, maybe a can of soup. Then in order to bring these home I'd have to lie to my mother. I'd say I'd been junking, picking up pop bottles and the like, and selling them. Otherwise the food and I would go flying through the window.

One afternoon I was passing an alleyway when I heard my name called in a fierce whisper. I turned and there was a whole gang of kids in a huddle. They were listening to a cousin of mine proposing a great idea. All that he was putting over was a scheme to clean out the whole neighborhood of its valuables.

"We all know where our parents, and our uncles and aunts keep their rings and their watches and their earrings and all that stuff," he pointed out. "We know all the hideaways. It'll be a cinch. We'll cop it all, sell it, and be rich!"

Caught by the excitement of the planning and stirred by the daring deeds involved I agreed to get in on "The Big Haul." Everybody knew I was a favorite of my Uncle Tony, who ran a coffee house, and he and his wife, my Aunt Julia, were assigned as my victims. But when I began to think of Aunt Julia, who practically adopted me for a couple of years, and my uncle who was my greatest fan when I started out singing Syrian songs in his place, my enthusiasm melted. And when I looked ahead to the day I would be confessing my crime to the priest I knew it was no go.

Some of the other kids went through with it. One who was caught blabbed the whole story and there was a mass meeting of horrified parents. But what sticks to my mind is the tragedy which closed the affair. In the midst of all the furore my cousin, the ringleader, ran out from his house into the street to be killed instantly by a truck. The mass-meeting ended. No kids were punished. The sorrow that fell over everyone took care of that . . . took care of everything.

THE understanding I found in my own home and in my neighborhood I also found in the outer world. When my brother Ray was 12, and I was only 10 years old, we got a job selling pop and candy in the Empire theater in Toledo on Sunday afternoons. This meant getting out of Sunday School early and sometimes missing it altogether. This in turn meant showing up mornings in the office of our parochial school principal for fitting punishment. But invariably, as we stood in line with 10 or 15 other boys guilty of the same offense, our teacher, Sister Mary Elizabeth of the Ursuline Nuns, would sweep into the room looking for us. She would take us both by the ear and announce, "I'll take care of these boys myself."

The principal would nod assent and she would lead us from the room with such a severe look on her face that the other boys would all feel sorry for us. Downstairs we would march to the school kitchen where she would turn on us and demand to know what we had for breakfast. We'd tell her . . . generally it was coffee and a slice of bread. Shaking her head indignantly she would fill two big glasses with milk, get a plate of doughnut-sized cookies and plank them down on a table. "Now," she would order, "you boys sit down and meditate. And when you are through come right up to the class!"

Sister Mary Elizabeth knew what our home life was like and that we had to work whenever we got a chance. She also knew that the Empire theater was a burlesque house and, I think, regarded it as a source of possible evil influence on us which she must fight off by special means. This took the form not only of milk and cookies, but of all sorts of efforts to get us to like our studies and our school relationships. She encouraged the dramatic instincts she knew Ray and I had and helped us to persevere in this direction. When I was chosen for a principal part in a city-wide Catholic schools play she was so delighted you'd think she herself had won the victory . . . and maybe she had. Years later it came to me that Ray and I were privileged pupils in St. Francis, but that this was no compliment to our personalities or anything like that. Sister Mary Elizabeth and all the others who helped us acted merely on precedent set by One whom they followed. We were privileged only because we had nothing. I say this realization came to me . . . I should add where. It came to me as I knelt in church, where all good thoughts have come to me.

THERE was a day in my life when, thus kneeling, in a Detroit church, I faced a vexing problem. My wife Rosemary was expecting our first baby (now our oldest daughter, Margaret). The doctor had said he would wait for his money but I knew the hospital would require $70 in advance. In my pocket was exactly $7.70—seven one-dollar bills and the change. I don't know what prompted me, but when the collection basket was handed around I put in a dollar and when I left my pew I handed over the other six as a contribution to the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, then conducting a drive for its missionary work. Now I had 70 cents left. In front of the altar I said a prayer which in part went:

" . . . I have given my last seven dollars but I need it back ten times. . . ."

It was perfectly true that my wife could go to the county hospital and have her baby without charge. But if you'll forgive a young husband, I wanted her to have the cheer and uplift that might come in a nice room—even if it was to be not a fully private room but a four-bed one. And there was another reason. I was by now an entertainer in Detroit's beer-gardens and night spots. Many people knew me . . . yet they didn't know I had nothing. I was someone who told jokes, sang funny songs. The jokes might not sound so funny, nor the songs, if they heard that my wife was a charity case in a public ward. The effect might be disastrous on my work and on my income at a time when I needed it most.

That night I was in my dressing room at the club when I was called to the telephone. It was my agent. The Jam Handy Films, a commercial motion picture company, wanted me to play a short part in a commercial production. Rehearsal would be the next day, the scene would be shot the day following, and on the third day I would get my salary—$75! Here it was—my money back tenfold, just as I had prayed! On the fourth day Margaret was born—her tiny basket-bed paid for, if not the hands which delivered her. That was taken care of later.

It was funny but after this I seemed to go on a "Ten Times Kick," as I called it. If I gave a quarter to a beggar I'd have $2.50 thrown to me on the stage right after my first song (in those days it was not yet an insult to throw money to an entertainer in a night club, it was part of your pay). I think I used to go around looking for people who wanted money, supremely confident that it would come back to me 1,000 per cent.

I know this doesn't make sense but I had a special background for feeling this way . . . and again, it leads back to my upbringing, and to my mother. She, too, "planted" good deeds when there could seem to be no return, she too gave when sometimes she had not to give. When anyone came to our door—the gas man, even, the insurance man for his nickel and dime premiums—she would always have the same greeting: "Hello. Are you hungry?" This, as she told us, was the way of her people. For in Lebanon if a stranger came to your door he must have come from another village or town, and if so he must have walked and must naturally be hungry and tired.

And above all she was scrupulous in obeying the Lebanese "Three-day Hospitality Rule." If travelers who were of your people came to your door seeking relatives, you had but one duty, even though you yourself were not related to them. "Welcome and spread your bedding," you had to say, and for three days, by tradition, they were your guests. When they were ready to leave a parting lunch was to be made for them. In my boyhood there were five instances in which such people were welcomed, housed and fed by my mother . . . though we ourselves might not be fed.

I AM pretty sure that anyone brought up in this sort of home would feel about religion as I do, but it is apparent that not all people have had this sort of experience in their younger days. One night I was seated in a Chicago restaurant with a group of friends when one of them challenged the whole idea of church.

"What kind of God do they talk about?" he scoffed. "You and I know very well that there is no God; that when you are dead you are dead!"

There is no point in arguing with a fellow who talks like that and I made no attempt at it. But then he went on. "And all this comfort people talk about getting from their belief, are they kidding?"

About this I could say a few words, I felt. My exact words I don't remember, but in general they were as follows:

"Joe. Let us say that you are dying and I am the last man to talk to you before you go. I can tell you either of two stories, both of them phoney, mind you, but you can have your choice. I can say, 'Joe, old fellow, in a few minutes you will be dead and, as you say, really dead. What is left of you might make good soap, lampshades, whatever can be done with the substances that were organized to make up a fellow like you but now are just a meaningless mass. So, so long Joe. It's no more for you, nothing, the end.' Or, I can speak as follows: 'Joe, you are what people term dying, but when this is over you will really begin living . . . for the first time since your birth. In a few minutes, Joe, just a few minutes, the mystery of eternal goodness will bathe you in a wonderful light and you will be taken up to be with the kind God who gave you thought and feeling that you might use these to help know Him. You remember how music could inspire you on earth, Joe, and how you wondered at its power? Now you'll know. You remember how love stirred in you and you wondered where it came from? Now you will find out. And Joe, only one thing more before you go to your happiness. My time will come too and then I'll join you. I'll be seeing you, Joe!' And then I stopped for a moment before I asked, "Well? Which story do you want?"

He jerked up straight as if from a trance. "Oh, well," he protested, "if you put it that way!"

"That's the way it is, Joe," I said.

It's funny. Some people want an affidavit from God that he really exists. They want the sunshine and the rain, the things which grow, the majesty of the earth, mountains and valleys, the beauty of a butterfly's wings and the love that kindles in a mother's eyes to appear before a notary public and swear that there is a purpose behind them.

Other people? Well, they know. I know. Even if I am just a singer, a happy singer. I sing for my people. And, oh, yes, I have picked me a little known saint for whom I sing special songs. His name is St. Jude, and in his name I have started a foundation to build a hospital in Memphis, Tennessee. No one will be asked who or what they are when they seek admission. That's another thing those who are supposed to know will know already. St. Jude will know. God will know. Who else's business will it be?

(Continued from page 27) of the Lanza benevolence were relegated to the shadows and into the sun came the rumors, innuendo, and malicious gossip.

PERSONS who had once been employed by Lanza and paid handsomely for their work, began to curry favor by dropping tasty morsels such as, "You know this guy has always been half-cracked, don't you? For years he's had rocks in his head."

One circulating story was that Lanza had engaged in a fist fight with his psychiatrist. Another told that Lew Wassermann, Lanza's agent, came to the house one day bearing a $50,000 check for Mario, only the tenor refused to see him and left orders for Wassermann to "leave the check with the butler." A parking lot attendant said he was slapped in the face by Mrs. Mario Lanza and unfairly fired because of her complaint. A day later it came out that the parking attendant had been dismissed "for an entirely different reason than being rude to Mrs. Lanza." By the time the truth negated the accusation, Betty Lanza was in the Cedars of Lebanon Hospital giving birth to Mario Lanza's eight-pound son. "The way they've been talking about us," Betty Lanza said only a few hours before the ambulance whizzed her into confinement, "you'd think we were a family of insane criminals. For months now we've done nothing but mind our own business. We've had enough to do moving into our new house and getting things settled. We haven't been anywhere. Mario has said absolutely nothing for public consumption, nothing about himself, The Student Prince, or the studio. The lawyers have handled everything and yet if you believe what you read in the papers, Mario has been fighting everyone."

A day later when I asked Mario to comment on the constant flow of disparagement his fight with the studio had engendered, all he would say was, "Have a cigar! Have two cigars! What do you think, a boy! My Betty has given me a boy! Isn't that sensational? We've got his second name picked out. Anthony. I don't know about his first name. Betty neither. He's a regular bruiser, weighed eight pounds. How do you like it? Mario Lanza is the father of one boy, two girls. A son. Right now, I'm the happiest man in the world. That's all I can say. The happiest man in the world."

Just how long this state of ecstasy will last for Mario, no one at the moment of this writing can accurately prophesy; it is safe to assume, however, that this April will find him back at MGM, hard at work—in all probability on The Student Prince—earning his weekly stipend of $1,500 a week.

MARTIN GANG, Lanza's lawyer, says, "I feel that 1953 will be a very good year for Mario. I hate litigations and long hassles in court and I think everything can and will be worked out to the mutual satisfaction of all parties involved in this damage suit. I have great hopes that Mario will return to work very shortly and on the best of terms with MGM. He is a very talented entertainer, one of the best money-makers the studio has ever had, and well, I'm sure things will work themselves out."

The legal firm of Loeb & Loeb, representing MGM, feels much the same.

"Many people don't seem to understand this," their spokesman, Harry Gershon, points out, "but Loew's has not cancelled its employment agreement with Mr. Lanza. Not at all. What the studio did was to cancel one production, The Student Prince, and to sue Lanza for the moneys spent in preparing that production and for the potential profits, $5,198,888 altogether.

"Under the terms of his employment agreement with MGM, and these terms are still in effect, Lanza has to make another film for the studio in 1953—I think it's supposed to start by April—and another film in 1954.

"By cancelling The Student Prince, the studio contends that Lanza owes them three more pictures. I have no way of knowing whether MGM will start up The Student Prince again in April of 1953 or not. All I do know is that right now no one has ordered us to drop the damage suit against Mr. Lanza, and we are preparing to continue it. This in no way precludes Mr. Lanza from working at MGM. It is my feeling that he'll make several more pictures there, abiding by his employment contract."

I asked Mr. Gershon what would happen in the event Mario began work on The Student Prince in April. "How could the studio sue him for damages on the potential profits," I asked, "if he made the picture and it was released?"

The attorney conceded that a portion of the damage suit would of necessity have to be withdrawn, and that under those circumstances Loew's would probably sue only for the pre-production damages of $695,888, the amount listed in the original complaint as the cost of the film's preparation.

What will probably happen is that MGM will continue with the damage suit against Mario. In the event it wins the case and receives a judgment, it will probably not exercise the judgment—that is, attach Mario's salary and royalties—so long as he behaves himself and causes no further stoppage in production. Should Mario become intractable, however, the studio may get tough.

Significantly enough, under the regime of Louis B. Mayer, MGM handled its stars with silk gloves. Judy Garland, it is estimated, cost the studio a small fortune in delays, and yet no suit for damage was ever filed against her, this despite the fact that she was earning $5,000 a week when she was giving studio executives their biggest headaches.

An executive who was asked to comment upon the difference in treatment accorded Judy and Mario, said, "Let's face it. Judy was a sick girl at the time. You'll put up with a lot of nonsense from a woman that you'll never take from a man. Besides, things were different then. Business wasn't so rough. A studio could afford to be liberal. Nowadays we've got to watch every cent."

WHAT caused Mario Lanza's disagreement with the studio in the first place? Why did he back away from The Student Prince when camera work was just about to begin?

To date three reasons have been offered: (1) Owing to a disagreement with his sponsor and personal manager, Sam Weiler, Mario found himself on the brink of nervous collapse (2) Mario was unhappy at MGM and wanted to get out of his contract, especially after Because You're Mine, a film he violently fought against making (3) Mario did not want to make The Student Prince with Curt Bernhardt directing.

Here for the first time is the essential truth about Mario, his relationship with Sam Weiler, his behavior at MGM, and his subsequent nervous upheaval.

IN the Fall of 1945, a mousey, moustached, dark-haired little businessman, named Sam Weiler, was paying a vocal instructor, Polly Robertson, Room 802, the Carnegie Hall Building, New York City, $5 an hour to teach him how to sing.

Mr. Weiler was not a millionaire at the time or even a particularly wealthy individual. He worked for and with his brother, Jack D. Weiler, for many years vice-president of the Federation of Jewish 71

Philanthropies of New York, and his annual earnings ranged from $20,000 to $40,000. He owned a profitable boys' camp in Pointelle, Pa., the Echo Lake Camp, and with his wife Selma, he lived a good and charitable and comfortable life. He rented an apartment on one of the streets in the east 90's; he worked hard as a realtor for his brother, and he spent the winters in Miami. "Taking singing lessons," he says, "was just a pleasant hobby with me."

One afternoon, after she'd finished giving him his instruction, Polly Robertson turned to Sam Weiler and said, "Some day I'm going to let you listen to a voice greater than Caruso's."

"Fine," Sam Weiler said.

Two days later, Mario Lanza walked into Polly Robertson's studio. "Here," said Miss Robertson, "is the voice greater than Caruso's." Weiler and Lanza shook hands. This was the first time they met.

Mario sang a song for Weiler. Sam was mesmerized. "As God is my witness," he recalls, "it floored me. I fell on my nose. I had never in my life heard anything so naturally brilliant. I went home and I raved all night long to my wife about Mario. 'This kid,' I told her, 'has the greatest voice in the world, barring none.'"

When Weiler met Lanza, Mario was neither broke nor starving. He was substituting for Jan Peerce on the Celanese radio program "Great Moments In Music" and earning $500 a crack which was incredible in view of the fact that he had known little or no formal voice coaching.

In December of 1945, Lanza met Weiler in the lobby of the Carnegie Hall Building and invited him across the street for a friendly cup of coffee. A gallon of coffee later Weiler had agreed to dine with Mario and his bride, Betty, in their fourth-floor walkup at 8 West 49th Street.

That evening, Betty and Mario Lanza asked Sam Weiler if he would help them. Mario was smart enough to realize that his voice needed training, careful training, that if he sang on one program after another, "just to earn a buck," he would eventually abuse his voice.

"How much do you think you'd need to live on?" Weiler asked.

Betty and Mario talked it over. "If we could be sure of $70 a week," Betty Lanza said, "I think Mario could do it."

Weiler thought for a moment. "Tell you what," he said, "I'm going down to Florida for my winter vacation. You let me think about it for a few weeks."

ON February 1st, 1946, Mario Lanza and Sam Weiler signed the original contract whereby Weiler agreed to pay for Lanza's vocal instruction and give him $70 a week in return for 10% of Lanza's eventual gross earnings. Weiler was also to pay off any existing Lanza debts. These consisted of fairly sizable bills at D'Andrea Brothers, a clothing establishment where Mario had gone to outfit himself with day-time and formal clothes, and at the Park Central Hotel (now the Park Sheraton) where Betty and Mario had lived for a short while.

Lanza at this time was under contract to Columbia Concerts, so Weiler went down to see Peter Herman Adler, chief of that outfit, and together they decided that Mario should be taken off all work and put in the hands of Enrico Rosati, the great vocal teacher of Benjamino Gigli.

This was done. Weiler paid for the lessons and saw to it that the Lanzas got their $70 a week. In September of 1946 when Columbia felt he was ready for some good concert experience, Lanza and two other singers were formed into the Bel Canto trio, booked at $800 a performance, and sent on the road.

The trio did fairly well, and the Lanzas spent that winter with Sam Weiler in Florida. Between Weiler and Lanza there gradually developed an almost father-and-son relationship. Each had unlimited faith in the other and complete trust. Lanza who has no money sense whatever, relied upon Weiler for professional and financial guidance. While Weiler knew precious little about the music or entertainment world, he was shrewd enough to know that Lanza was following the shortest and most direct path to fame.

A writer asked Frank Sinatra's okay to compile all the Sinatra gags in a joke book. Frankie came back with a grim NO.

In 1947 Mario Lanza hit the road again, and here for the first time, he actually began to make news. Following his appearance as soloist in Chicago's Grant Park on July 20th, 1947, Claudia Cassidy, the arts critic of the Chicago Tribune, wrote, among other things: "Mr. Lanza was something approaching a sensation. . . has a superb natural tenor which he uses by instinct . . . He needs work but he does amazingly well right now . . . His 'Celeste Aida' was beautifully done, and the crowd roared with delight."

WITH notices like that, the word soon spread throughout the entertainment world that Lanza was "a natural." A month later when he arrived in Hollywood and sang at the well-publicized Hollywood Bowl, the house was almost full. When the concert was over, a hive of talent scouts made a bee-line to his dressing room door.

Besieged by many studio offers, Mario didn't know what to do. He turned to Sam Weiler, who was still working for his brother in New York. "Sam," he said over the long distance phone, "they're making me one offer after another. What'll I do?" "Listen to all of them," Weiler said, "but sign nothing."

Lanza did exactly that until Weiler arrived in Hollywood. Once Sam checked in, a new agreement was drawn up between these two in which Mario agreed to pay Weiler 20 per cent of his gross earnings in return for Weiler's services as agent and personal manager. This agreement meant that Weiler had to abandon his business affiliations back East.

The basic employment agreement that Weiler negotiated with Metro on Mario's behalf shows how worthwhile this move was for everyone concerned. For signing with MGM, Lanza was given a flat $10,000 as a bonus. His starting salary was to be $750 a week for 20 weeks; he was to work only six months a year, make one picture a year, receive a rising bonus starting at $15,000 for each picture, receive subsequent yearly raises of $250 in salary.

When he finished making That Midnight Kiss, Mario was given a bonus of $25,000 which was $10,000 more than the studio had agreed to pay him. When he finished Toast Of New Orleans, he was given a bonus of $50,000. This was $25,000 more than the bonus the contract had called for. When he finished The Great Caruso, Mario was gifted with a $100,000 bonus, twice what his agreement entitled him to. In a sentence, Metro more than compensated for Lanza's relatively low starting salary.

Moreover, Metro was extremely courageous in taking a chance on Lanza in the first place. Anyone who has seen the screen test he made will testify to that. He photographed so poorly that some of the technicians were certain something had gone wrong in the lighting. Eventually when he went before the cameras for his first film, his hair had to be tinted red his swarthy Italian skin powdered pink.

Lanza's relationship with the studio, other than for a few minor peccadillos, was excellent for his first three pictures. Nicholas Schenck, chief of Loew's, was leery about making The Great Caruso, but L. B. Mayer insisted it would be a hit, and he was right. The Great Caruso has earned more money for Metro than any other film released within the past decade.

LANZA first began to disagree with MGM when the studio presented him with the script of Because You're Mine. When Mario finished reading the story, his first words were, "This is a piece of junk." Sam Weiler did not want Mario to make the picture, either. He, too, was certain it would turn out to be a lemon.

When Lanza is emotionally disturbed, he, like many other people, finds relief in food. He began to eat. The more the studio insisted upon his making Because You're Mine the more he ate. Week after week he grew fatter and fatter. He had once tipped the scales at 280 lbs., and it looked for a while as if he were determined to beat this record.

Before Lanza agreed to make Because You're Mine, there were many arguments at the studio, many heart-to-heart talks, a long, arduous dieting session and, worst of all, the development of bad blood between various factions.

Lanza was accused of being an ingrate, of biting the hand that had fed him so magnanimously; he, in turn, pointed out that he earned quite a few bucks for the studio, that there was no point in ruining a valuable property by placing him in a series of potboilers.

While relations with the studio deteriorated Lanza witnessed several gradual changes in his other relationships. Sam Weiler, for example, hired MCA to represent Mario and relinquished 10 of his 20 per cent. Weiler also formed a corporation, Marsam, Inc., in which he and Mario were the principal stockholders. Mario assigned to Weiler the power of attorney, and Weiler became the moneyman in the outfit, subsequently hiring a business manager, Noel Singer, to disburse money for Mario's constantly expanding expenses. Mario also signed a radio deal with Coca-Cola and a new recording deal with RCA. He became so busy he had very little time for his wife and two small daughters.

HE was happy at home, however, deeply in love with his wife, paternally proud of his little daughters, and while he had no idea of how much money he was worth, he felt certain that Sam Weiler was overseeing his financial interests in a shrewd and sagacious manner. His masseuse, while rubbing him down, had told him about a gold mine, and Mario had asked Sam to investigate, to see whether he should invest surplus funds in oil, tungsten, and light metals as well as gold.

He was particularly proud of the fact that he had earned a million dollars in 1951, and while his expenses had been tremendously high, he had paid his state income tax, a Federal income tax of $425,000, all his commissions, and he owed no one a cent.

Two things did nettle him from time to time. He disliked intensely the house he was living in, a French chateau-type he and Betty had rented on Whittier Drive in Beverly Hills, and he also disliked the fact that so many people had come to rely upon him for a living.

With a shrewdness never attributed to him, Mario realized that if ever he should want to quit, just stop cold, gather his family, and go to Italy and study at La Scala for a year or two, the resultant hue and cry from the army of people who had latched on to him would be so great that he would either have to go back to work or face violent censure.

That, of course, is what happened.

In March last year, Betty Lanza became pregnant for the third time. She was none too well at the outset, and this disturbed Mario. He was overworked and upset about the contract negotiations regarding a new recording deal with RCA. He had quarreled with Nicky Brodsky about some new songs for The Student Prince. The operetta was of such high standard Mario felt the score should not be tampered with. In the end, however, he gave in and agreed with Joe Pasternak that the new songs would help modernize the old musical score. When Curt Bernhardt was assigned to direct the picture, no objections were forthcoming from Lanza. Bernhardt had done a workmanlike job in re-making Le Bleu Etoile, a French motion picture classic, into The Blue Veil for Wald and Krasna; he had done a good job in re-making The Merry Widow for MGM with Lana Turner. Lanza had no complaints until he and Bernhardt were closeted together for a story conference. It was then that word leaked out of Lanza's refusal to do The Student Prince. He and Bernhardt had disagreed about several important story points, and Mario "wasn't buying another Because You're Mine."

SIMULTANEOUSLY, Mario asked Sam Weiler for a look at the books of the Marsam Corporation. When he saw how much money had gone out, how little remained to him after earning approximately $1,500,000 in six years, he blew his top. He knew that Weiler had earned more than $150,000 in commissions, and somehow, he could not reconcile himself to the figures in front of his eyes. There were words, harsh Mabel Jones' jellies always go first!

Her name on the label tells you these preserves were made with care and presented with pride!

You have to get to the bazaar early to get a jar of Mabel Jones' grape jelly—and her rose geranium is out of this world.

Her fame as a jelly-maker goes back many years, to the time she won first prize at the fair. It has been growing ever since.

Mabel says, "I know folks count on my things to be extra good, so I just take a little extra care before I put my name on a glass of jelly."

Isn't that how any reputation is built?

The maker takes a little extra care before he puts his name on his product, and people recognize the difference and tell their friends. Soon his brand name becomes known as the symbol of a product proudly made, a product you can have confidence in.

You'll see many such fine brands in the pages of this magazine. Think of them when you shop, and name your brand—to better your brand of living.

words, between Betty Lanza and Sam Weiler. "Listen, Sam, I don't see why you should have the key to our house without our having the key to yours." Recrimination, accusation, and counter-accusation.

Weiler resigned and turned the books of the Marsam Corporation over to Lanza's attorneys who are currently having them audited. According to his contract with Lanza, Weiler will continue to receive 5 per cent of the singer's earnings for 11 years.

Lanza also grew heartsick. He had broken with the man who had sponsored him, who had come to his help, who had taken a chance on him. At the same time, Kitty Rightsel, an old and faithful friend who had acted as his secretary, packed her bags and announced that she'd had enough of Hollywood. She was going back to New York. Metro said that if Lanza insisted upon his refusal to act in The Student Prince, the studio would pull him off the Coca-Cola program. It controlled his radio appearances. True to its word the studio yanked him off the show. Betty announced that she wasn't going to live in that house on Whittier Drive another minute. She began negotiating with Nancy Sinatra for purchase of the Sinatra mansion. The deal soured, however, when Nancy asked a price the Lanzas considered a little out of line. Another project gone wrong. The obstetrician also warned Betty to be careful or she might lose the baby. Betty's mother and sister came out from Chicago. Mario's parents went to see Dore Schary and asked him to be understanding. Schary said he would be as understanding as he could, but the picture had to get under way. The studio called MCA. Lew Lindsay and Lew Wassermann of that organization were asked to talk to their boy, to get him into line. Mario kept looking at the books of the Marsam Corporation and wondering how he could have spent so much money. For the first time in his life he tried to delve into what for him was the unfathomable maze of high level finances. All he could determine was that after six years of intensive work, he was worth a little more than $100,000.

He was upset, and that's putting it mildly, but he knew he must take decisive steps. He abandoned The Student Prince temporarily, he closed his office; he hired the best lawyer he could get; he found a new house for himself in Bel-Air; he bought himself a new car to bolster his sagging spirits. Then he took his family and his belongings out of Beverly Hills.

ONCE in Bel-Air, he regained his composure. When Lew Wassermann suggested that a psychiatrist might help calm his nerves, Mario was most amenable to the suggestion. Immediately word was circulated throughout the movie colony that Mario was being psychoanalyzed. "He's going to one of those head-shrinkers," people were told. Lanza was never psychoanalyzed. Neither did he fight with his psychiatrist. That was just part of the slander directed at the tenor. After a few sessions he had no need of the doctor and let him go. It was all pleasant, and professional.

After his legal hassels with Sam Weiler and Metro are straightened out, he hopes to return to the studio and star in The Student Prince. Presently, he will make two or more films and then, circumstances permitting, take off for Europe and operatic study in Italy. After that he hopes to become the foremost tenor the Metropolitan Opera in New York has ever presented to the world.

All this lies within his ken and his capabilities, and as far as he's concerned Mario Lanza is on his way back . . . to the top. Of that you can be certain. END

french without tears

That's why you can read almost any day that Leslie and Geordie will obtain a divorce before he joins the Coast Guard in April. Or that Leslie is pregnant, which is why George won't divorce her, and why MGM is keeping her out of dancing parts and giving her dramatic roles as in Lili and The Story Of Three Loves. The story might be that there will be a separation but no divorce since Geordie doesn't want to give up half of the $8,000,000 he supposedly has in his own name. Another might announce that language difficulties are causing all the trouble.

However, George has deduced the source of one story. He says, "I did it myself. Listen. Leslie likes to paint, you know. I don't know why, but she does. It relaxes her and let's face it—anything is better than ballet. At least for my dough."

"Well, Leslie has signed up with an art class out at the Palos Verdes College. Every now and again they take field trips. A few weeks ago her class went down to Ensenada in Mexico. I think to paint a fishing scene, something like that."

"The way Leslie looks with that hair-do of hers and her funny little face, you can't miss her. Somebody saw her in Mexico and told a radio commentator about it."

"This radio commentator specializes in Hollywood gossip."

"This guy phones me one afternoon and says, 'I understand your wife's in Mexico. What's she doing down there?'"

"I have a funny sense of humor and just for a gag I said, 'She's down there for the divorce, of course. Didn't you know?'"

"That's right," this commentator said. "I forgot all about that." A few hours later friends started phoning me, telling me they'd heard a news broadcast in which Leslie and I were getting a Mexican divorce. A day or two later the items started appearing in the gossip columns."

"It's so silly," Leslie explains in perfect English. She speaks the language extremely well. Her mother was an American chorus girl who married a Parisian pharmacist in France. "We really pay no attention to rumors. Only last week a friend of ours in San Francisco, she's married to the columnist, Dean Jennings, she said to me, 'Leslie, I've read so many items about your pregnancies—you must be some relative to a rabbit!'"

WHAT then is the truth about this sloe-eyed dancer and the man with whom she eloped to Las Vegas on September 23rd, 1951?

In marrying Geordie Hormel a month-and-a-half after she first met him, did Leslie Caron really marry a millionaire as so many envious Hollywood females jealously commented? Was it really love or just an infatuation that has burned itself out?

To begin with they are completely, madly, and tempestuously in love, as only young people can be in love, young people who realize that in a matter of weeks they will be separated, perhaps for years, and realizing this, live each day as if it were their last, with all the passion and ardor and stamina they can summon.

"In April," Leslie says, "Geordie must report to the Coast Guard. He will have to serve two years. I don't like to think of it, but when he's gone, I guess I'll go back into training again. Since our marriage I haven't been in real training. I mean when you (Continued on page 78).

he owns in Culver City—which may account for his physical breakdown.

SKIRMISHES OF THE MONTH:

Jeff Hunter, by all odds the most circumspect and well-behaved of Hollywood actors, gave away one of his two tickets for the London premiere of Snows Of Kilimanjaro, because he wanted to arrive at the theater unaccompanied (wifey Barbara Rush was in Hollywood at the time). Jeff explained to his British press agent that he didn't want to do anything that would make it seem he was "dating" while away from his family. No sooner had he arrived in the theater lobby than another press agent brought Coleen Gray over for a chat with Jeff. A dozen cameramen got busy. Next morning's papers showed Jeff and Coleen arriving together at the preem!... Which 20th-Fox's London reps found amusing—that is, save Jeff, because his carefully laid plan had gone awry!

Hunter & Rush

Marilyn Monroe's doctor told her she wouldn't have so many colds if she wouldn't run around her bedroom barefooted... During his first ten weeks back in Hollywood from Paris, John Barrymore, Jr.—a party-thrower—was asked to move from four apartments... Jackie Rohertson took off for Oklahoma to tell her troubles to Dale's closest kin, who apparently understand him better than his wife does! Maybe Jackie got some pointers... Betsy von Furstenberg long-distanced Hollywood from New York that she's definitely not going to marry Franchot Tone, if anybody cares... Silliest stunt of the year: co-starring Barbara Payton and Sonny Tufts in a quickie called Run For The Hills.

FUNNIES:

On the set of Paramount's Here Come The Girls, Tony Martin was kidding Arlene Dahl about her romance with Fernando Lamas. Then Tony was called on stage to sing one of the songs for Girls that he had pre-recorded. As he opened his mouth to sing Arlene gave the signal and out of Tony's mouth poured Fernando's voice singing "Villia" from The Merry Widow! Arlene had supplanted Tony's pre-recording with a record of Fernando borrowed from MGM... Time, says Danny Thomas, is the stuff between paydays... And women and money, says Steve Cochran, are the same—keep 'em both active or they lose interest!... Barbara Stanwyck and Bob Wagner were trying to think of a better title than Nearer My God To Thee, which is about the sinking of the Titanic. Barbara suggested Bottoms Up!

Lamas

Doris Day's son, Terry, is just beginning to realize his Mommy is a big star. He asked her to autograph a photo for the man next door. Doris was signing her name to a head photo when Terry jolted her with this: "But how about a picture of all of you—'cause he likes to look at all of you, Mommy!"... Short Short Story with absolutely no moral, from the Paramount Studio Cluh News: "For Sale, platinum wedding ring with nine diamonds, $150 value for $60. Also semi-modern davenport, excellent condition"... Susie Hayward walked under the canvas of a set for White Witch Doctor, in which she's co-starring with Boh Mitchum, and said, "Seems funny to go into my tent and not find Greg Peck propped up on a cot in there, listening for a hyena!"... Jack Benny was getting a haircut at Jerry Rothschild's barbershop in Beverly Hills. The barber stopped him with this: "What do you want to do today, Mr. Benny, tell stories—or pay cash?"... And when Marie Wilson met dignified, dapper Frank Stanton, the president of CBS, she looked admiringly at his luxurious gray thatch and said, "You have lovely hair—who does it?"

HOLLYWOOD HEARTBEATS:

Vera-Ellen gave Dean Miller the sweater she knitted for him and said goodbye to him... Wanda Hendrix gifted Ralph Meeker with an expensive silver manuscript holder for Christmas... Walton Wickett, an electronics engineer from Palo Alto, Calif., was Olivia de Havilland's first date after her divorce from Marcus Goodrich. This was only a few days after Olivia accidentally ran into Joan Fontaine in front of Romanoff's and made up that long-standing feud right then and there!... Craig Hill rushed back from skiing to escort Susan Zanuck, his boss's daughter, to Ethel Merman's white-tie-&-tails farewell-to-Hollywood party... Only thing hotter than Rita Hayworth's romance with Count Villapadierna as we went to press was Aly Khan's amour with Gene Tierney... There was no honeymoon for Jane Wyman. She went right to work for Warners in So Big... Tah Hunter wrapped a rich-looking rock (a diamond to you!) around Judy Powell's finger—but not the finger! Remember Judy? Used to be Dan Dailey's Gal Friday.

de Havilland

Boh Taylor bought Ursula Thiess some luggage and right away everybody was prophesying they would elope... Soothsayers were also predicting that Lana Turner would divorce Boh Topping in California, as well as in Nevada, in order to protect her community property rights... Roberta Haynes, Gary Cooper's new leading lady, has been torching for Marlon Brando. But Marlon's 100 percent for Movita... I heard an interesting story about Bing Crosby. It's said he patterned himself after three people in his life: hot trumpeter Bix Beiderbecke, hot jazz singer Louie Armstrong, and Dixie Crosby! I had heard about Bix and Louie but never the angle about Dixie. It's news to me, and I'm sure it will be to you, that his unique delivery was inspired by her and patterned after her. Dixie, you know, was in the acting game long before Bing (she retired to become a devoted wife and mother), so this well-authenticated story rings true.

WHO'S MAD AT WHOM:

Rumors were flying thick and fast from Europe that Greg and Greta Peck were fini, kaput, busted up!... And ditto—Gene and Betsy Kelly . . . What a month for that sort of thing—they were also saying it about Dick and Nora Eddington Flynn Haymes; about Keefe and Norma Brasselle; about Danny and Sylvia Kaye; and about Mary Castle and Sy Bartlett . . . To kill off that silly feud, Doris Day dedicated a song on her airshow to Peggy Lee (Peggy, you may remember, is supposed to have won the part that Doris wanted in The Jazz Singer!) . . . Audrey Totter is a Christian Scientist and her husband, Dr. Leo Fred, is an M.D. . . . Scott Brady and Diana Lynn thought they were all set to co-star in The Moon Is Blue until producer Otto Preminger changed his mind overnight and decided he wanted Bill Holden and Terry Moore. The roof fell in!

Day

Annie Sheridan carries a vial of bitters in her purse in case her host serves gin but no bitters . . . Phyllis Ferrer, José's estranged spouse, is practicing dancing. And so's Rosemary Clooney, who's supposed to be José's next spouse. But you can rest assured they're not practicing for the same part! . . . Jane Powell got so excited she had to leave the opening of José Greco's dance troupe here. And two hours later her new daughter arrived . . . Liz Dailey was with Bob Neal and Dan Dailey was with Beetsy Wynn. Keenan's estranged wife, at the Greco shindig. Talk about deep-freezers! . . . Craig Stevens wasn't a bit amused that Alexis Smith and Bill Bowers were dating while he was in New York.

SEX APPEAL:

Dennis Morgan reports he overheard his very young daughter in a conversation with her very young girl friend, saying, "Yeah, but all men are nice till you marry 'em!" . . . Annie Blyth wears a fur called, oddly, "naked mink" to parties . . . Debra Paget fixed up her new apartment this way: Black walls in the living room, against which is set a 12-foot white couch. And her bedroom walls are covered with white satin . . . One of the most beautiful things about the opening of the Palm Springs El Mirador: Penny Edwards in a sun suit . . . Virginia Mayo wore a fluffy something she described as "Mamie Eisenhower Pink" at the preem of The Jazz Singer . . . Wait'll you see Katie Grayson as a blonde in The Grace Moore Story. She's soooo easy to love! . . . Melinda Markey, Joan Bennett's daughter, shrank her 19-inch waist another inch, and don't ask me how.

Paget

Every time Betty Grable returns to 20th-Fox from suspension she looks younger than the time before! . . . Mitzi Gaynor went back on the payroll, same studio, pounds lighter thanks to something called the "Mayo diet" . . . And Ruth Roman slimmed down to a sleek 119 only two weeks after the birth of Richard Roman Hall . . . Farley Granger developed a tremendous set of muscles for Golden Blade, then turned down the picture. Now he's stuck with the muscles . . . Teresa Wright screamed when they made her a blonde for The Steel Trap. But most of the newspaper reviewers commented about her new sexiness!

ODDS BODKINS:

They have to paste on false eyelashes to make Peggy Lee's look longer—and powder down Rory Calhoun's natural long lashes because they look too artificial on a man . . . Tony Curtis has turned into a fine magician, thanks to his role in Houdini. The kid's good! . . . Jerry Lewis gifted Dean Martin with a child's scooter . . . And this was Pete Lawford's bon voyage gift to Cary Grant and Betsy Drake before they took off 'round-the-world: a traveling coffeepot monogrammed "Mr. and Mrs. Beartrap" . . . Faith Domergue swears she got that black eye not from her husband but from her child—insists she was tucking the kid in for the night and his fist shot out from under the covers and gouged her orb! . . . Marlene Dietrich was 50 years old last Dec. 27th . . . Joanne Dru, who handles children so well in My Pal Gus, sends her own to a psychoanalyst . . . And Donald and Gwen O'Connor, who got together again after a separation as we were writing this, split up in the first place, in the opinion of their friends, because they went to the same analyst!

Calhoun

Ronald Reagan, the distinguished Screen Actors Guild prexy, walked down the theater aisle at the Bwana Devil preem in a tuxedo and carrying a big bag of popcorn . . . Ruth Hussey gave up smoking after the fourth matchbox exploded in her hands . . . After 22 years in Hollywood, Groucho Marx broke down and bought a swimming pool . . . Jimmy Durante learned the hard way that Lily Pons eats garlic before every television performance . . . Van Johnson now wears red suede ankle-high slippers with his dinner clothes. He started the red Sox fad, remember? . . . Because of Piper Laurie's unnaturally red hair, Gene Evans, playing the villain who menaces Piper in Golden Blade, had to dye his natural red locks and beard a shiny black.

HOME FIRES BURNING:

John Wayne's oldest son, Michael, celebrated his 18th birthday. Are you too young to remember when Loretta Young was Michael's Godmother? I'm not! . . . Elaine Mahnken Rooney, the Mick's new wife, wants a movie career terribly much, although she keeps insisting, and very coyly, that she doesn't . . . Most dramatic Hollywood story of the year: Joan Leslie's courageous battle to rid her medico mate of the dope habit . . . Angela Lansbury and Peter Shaw put their Valley chalet up for sale . . . And, at British producer Jimmy Woolf's party, Tony Bartley, Deborah Kerr's husband, leaned over me to shout at Angela: "Angie, dahling, you look divinely pregnant!"

Lansbury & Shaw

Clifton Webb had the outside of his house painted lavender . . . Gordon and Sheila MacRae are practicing a new nightclub act together, for when, if and ever they decide to go out on the road together to turn a pretty penny or two! . . . Richard Todd's new son was christened Peter Grant Palethorpe Todd . . . Slat and Louis Calhern reconciled. There'll be no divorce . . . Mike Wilding's pet name for Liz Taylor—believe it or not—is "Drawers"!

(Continued from page 75) are in the ballet, you work all day, all night. You're always rehearsing. You're so tired at the end of a day, you have no time for love, no time for anything but to rest and then dance tomorrow. With Geordie here, all my time has gone for him, for us, for our marriage. But after he goes, I will have to throw myself into my work, dance, dance, dance.

"It's a great pity when our marriage is just getting started, but other young couples have to face the same thing. Maybe Geordie will be stationed around here for a while and maybe I can see him on weekends.

"It is a wonderful thing to have a career and act in movies, but Geordie is really the most important thing in my life. I love to dance, but I want a family, lots of children. Don't be surprised, ten, twelve, as many as that. French women like large families, and I am French, and in Geordie, I have a half-French husband."

THE object of this intense Gallic affection, Geordie Hormel, says, "There have been so many incorrect stories written about Leslie and me, I wish you'd get the record straight. Everytime I pick up a newspaper I read that I'm a millionaire. That isn't so.

"The plain, simple truth is that I'm about $40,000 in debt. I was in debt when Leslie married me, and I told her all about it, so this stuff about her marrying big money is a lot of bunk. I have to pay interest on the money I borrowed, and right now, Leslie has more money in the bank, savings from her own salary, than I've ever had. My grandfather founded the company in Austin, and my father is chairman of the board, but that doesn't mean I'm a millionaire or will even inherit the company. I have two brothers, and besides there are more than 500,000 shares of stock outstanding. All it means is that I can work in a meatpacking company, and that's what I did for three years before I came out to the coast and started to experiment with my recordings."

What Geordie does with music is to record one instrument at a time on tape and then dub the individual tapes onto a master so that eventually 13 to 18 wind instruments are recorded on one tape.

Several of these unusual recordings have been released to the public and while they've sold fairly well, Geordie has yet to earn back much of the $30,000 it has cost him to experiment. Two of his newest recordings, released by Coral, are "Twenty-Five Chickens" and "Sweet Georgia Brown." Recording engineers insist, however, that "This kid is liable to hit, and when he does, the dough will come rolling in. Like Les Paul, he's got some unique recording ideas and one of them is bound to click."

Oddly enough, while Leslie and Geordie care deeply for each other, they don't particularly care for each other's work. "Leslie is strictly a longhair when it comes to music," Geordie says, "Bach, Brahms, and Beethoven. And quite frankly, I don't enjoy the ballet. I think Leslie is a wonderful actress and will even be more so, which is why I'm glad her studio is putting her in dramatic roles. For years she's wanted to become the world's greatest ballerina, but in order to do that, a girl has to pretty much give up men. It's completely exhausting work, and I think I've talked her out of that. An actress, yes—but the world's greatest ballerina—that's out. As a matter of fact, I had no idea she was a dancer when I first saw her, or that Gene Kelly had discovered her in Paris or that Metro had signed her."

Leslie and Geordie took their first look at each other when Roland Petit, the impresario of the Ballet de Paris, came to Hollywood with his troupe in 1951, was entertained by Howard Hughes, and tossed a swimming party. Geordie Hormel was invited and eventually asked his host to introduce him to the little French girl whose coiffure resembled a rag mop. She was also dressed in a bathing suit that left precious little to the imagination.

Geordie and Leslie said hello to each other, and that was that! No spark, no love at first sight. A little physical awakening, but that's all. Fade out!

Fade in a week or so later. Geordie Hormel has returned from San Francisco to Bel Air where his parents have a man-

I SAW IT HAPPEN

While out walking my dog one day, I stopped to watch some ragged youngsters playing football in a vacant lot. The ball they were playing with rolled into the street, and a car, coming along right at that moment, ran over the ball, ruining it. A pretty girl saw what had happened, and going over to the young owner of the damaged ball, she gave him enough money to buy a new one. Who was the girl? Debbie Reynolds!

sion worthy of their position in American industry.

Here Geordie learns from his kid brother, Jimmy, that he and a friend are going out with three ballet dancers, Simon Mostov, Mireille Lefevre, and Leslie Caron. "Why don't you come along?" Jimmy asked. "We need another guy."

THE boys drove down to Beecher's, a barbecue restaurant on La Cienega and St. Monica Boulevards in Los Angeles where the girls were having dinner.

"Geordie and Jimmy were late," Leslie recalls, "and since they had tickets for Finian's Rainbow, we had to be downtown by 8:30. You know what Geordie does? When the waitress brings him his ham dinner, he empties the whole plate in his pocket and says, 'Okay, let's go.' Honestly, I thought he was crazy, crazy but cute. He didn't know I could speak any English, so we hardly spoke at all. He would look at me, and I would look at him, and we said very few words.

"After the show we went backstage to see Ella Logan, and she invited us to a party in Coldwater Canyon. Sometime during the night, she asked me for my phone number, to invite me to another party, I guess, and I said the number real loud so that Geordie would hear it. The next day I wasn't surprised at all when he called me."

According to Geordie's memory, "Leslie was living in a one-room apartment across from the studio at the time. I went down to see her the next day. We drove out to the beach, then to my folks' house, then around town. Then I asked her to marry me.

"Geordie, she said. You are crazy!" "No," I said, "I'm not crazy! I'm in love."

"I know it sounds foolish and impetuous to ask a girl to marry you on the second date, but I can honestly say that I've never had a wrong impulse that was important. Instinctively, I felt that Leslie was the right girl for me. I told her about my indebtedness, how I'd borrowed $40,000 from a holding company, how I'd started to build a house back in Austin and had given it up. I told her how much I'd put into my recordings, but she didn't seem to care at all about money. She'd had very little of it as a girl and she'd developed very well. She and her family were very happy. She knew that while money was important, it could never buy happiness.

"I told my mother and brothers about her. They took to her at once. My mother is French, you know. Daddy met her during World War I when he was a lieutenant stationed in France. Her maiden name was Germaine du Bois, and her father was in the wine business. Mother thought Daddy was a butcher when she married him."

Leslie says it was a strange and wonderful wedding she had. "Geordie's mother, his two brothers, and my brother all flew to Las Vegas. Geordie and I were married, and my father-in-law's chauffeur drove us back to San Francisco for the opening of An American in Paris. A week later we flew to Florida, then to the Virgin Islands to see my parents. My mother is teaching dancing down there, and my father is opening a little store in town. We also visited my grandmother on the island of St. Johns."

When Mr. and Mrs. George Hormel returned to Los Angeles they lived for a short period in the Hormel mansion, but not for long. Geordie began reading the newspaper advertisements while Leslie reported for work at Metro. "I must have answered over 200 ads," Geordie recalls, "before I found a place we could afford. It's located up in Laurel Canyon and it costs us $125 a month."

LESLIE and her husband live in a modern house in which the living room and kitchen are divided by a serving counter.

They sleep in one bedroom and have two other rooms for guests. Leslie bakes extremely well and does most of the cooking. She has one girl, Boots Sirshing, whose sister works for the Hormel family back in Minnesota, to help her with the house work.

The Hormels work diligently at their respective professions and hardly ever attend social functions of any nature. "We've been to one party in a year," Leslie says. "That was Chuck Walter's cocktail party. Being with each other is really enough for us."

Leslie says that so far she's been able to mix her career and her marriage and enjoy life to the fullest. After he finishes his years with the Coast Guard, however, Geordie will probably return to the family business in Minnesota, in which event Leslie says, "I will go with him, of course, and without any regrets. I can adapt myself to anything Geordie wants and wherever he wants it, because he is a good man and a fair man and an honest man, and such a husband is very rare and very hard to find, and if a girl has one she should hold on to a good thing. I don't know what the future holds for me, but I have tasted a little fame and a little money, and I have lived with Geordie, and I know that for a girl like me, it is marriage and a family that is important. I will try to escape into my dancing and my work while Geordie is gone, but who can run away from her heart?"

As for Geordie Hormel, the brash young hepcat who proposed and was accepted on their second date, he was asked recently to describe his bride in one sentence. "I can tell you very honestly," he said, and his eyes sparkled as he said it, "that I've never been married before but my little Leslie Caron is the best wife I ever had."

big noise from winnetka

(Continued from page 32) known as the fellow practically engaged to Vera-Ellen (a romance now over but not forgotten, he tells you in torchy tones) than for any work he had done on the screen. Then, by reason of his physique, which is a spread of masculinity six feet, three inches, now swinging the weight indicator on the scale over to 205 pounds, he got the role of a prizefighter opposite Jeff Chandler in Iron Man. The fans had a chance to take a good look at him—that did the trick. In the mail bags delivered to the studio every morning and ordinarily containing hundreds of letters to such stars as Chandler, Piper Laurie, Tony Curtis and Shelley Winters, there now began appearing messages to Rock; first by twos and threes, then by dozens, and now at the rate of something like 3,000 a month. The statistically-minded producers didn't wait for the big figures, however; they could tell what was coming by the rate of increase. Rock was away—and running steady.

In the past two years he has been in nine pictures, winding up with Lawless Breed, Seminole and Golden Blade, all three due to be released this winter. He worked for five months on one picture without a day off. This sounds like the studio is rushing a good thing, and that is exactly what it is doing. But Rock doesn't mind. When he says, "It's better than driving a truck," he means just that. Driving for a down-town Los Angeles produce firm he heaved so many tons of lettuce and tomatoes about in his time that just the sight of a salad used to make his muscles ache. It wasn't so much the difficulty of his work, as the boredom of it that made him look to the studios. "You want to know why truck drivers whistle at girls?" he asked the other day. "Well, sitting up there on the high seat, they are going crazy from nothing to do but steer that big crate on wheels. Why, every truck driver talks to himself, but I got so I was answering myself, and very stupidly, too. That's when I got scared into making a move."

DESPITE his growing popularity, which has given him a sense of security professionally, Rock has still not settled down to his new prominence socially. He does much better with a girl he knows than a girl he wants to know; is more easily a man among men than among women; is a great guy for sticking close to old friends like the Van Johnsons, Piper Laurie (and her whole family), Barbara Stanwyck, his old flame Vera-Ellen and his roommate Bob Preble. When strangers pay him too much adulation he can be at a loss.

Rock finds it difficult to take himself seriously. One day a studio executive overheard him singing in his dressing room. Going back to the talent rolls, the executive checked Rock's record and was surprised to find no mention of any musical ability. He dashed off some front-office memos to the effect that a Rock Hudson who could sing would greatly enhance their investment in him. The production heads all agreed and soon Rock was ordered to report to a vocal teacher. Weeks later a newspaper man lunching with Rock and a member of the publicity department wanted to know what kind of a voice he had. Rock looked puzzled and turned to the publicity man. "What would you say?" he asked. (Continued on page 83)

"I can't make left turns properly," says Piper Laurie. "That's the side your heart is on, and in anything affecting the heart . . . who knows which way to turn?" This is the eleventh article in a series written by the stars for you, the readers of MODERN SCREEN

by PIPER LAURIE, star columnist for March

Large earrings are a pet passion.

I love poetry and music and roses

To me, a home is a way of living

A date is a date is really a date!

I'VE OFTEN THOUGHT I'D LIKE TO WRITE. Then a chance like this one comes along, to fill up a column with something intelligent, and I'm stuck. I am reminded of a bit of verse by a newspaperman I know, and I feel I'm just the person he had in mind when he composed the following:

Hanging's the thing for the writer,

At the end of a rope let him caper,

Who spoils with thoughts mostly stale,

A batch of fresh, white paper.

Well . . . here goes anyway. But it should be plain that any resemblance between what I write and something new in ideas will not only be coincidental, but accidental as well. The only precaution I can take is to start off unpretentiously; to talk of small things . . . small things, like earrings, fluff and left turns in traffic. After that, if I feel I have gotten away with it, comes the deep stuff, the philosophy.

I don't like to speak over the telephone. Reason? I am always wearing earrings and they hit against the receiver (and hurt my head). Lots of women who wear earrings must have the same trouble. I suppose it would be asking too much to expect the telephone company to make their instruments out of soft rubber instead of the hard rubber or plastic they use? Yes . . . too much. Forgive me. I have hundreds of pairs of earrings, from dime store ones collected when I was a youngster, to good ones acquired in the last few years.

My ears aren't pierced, of course. I don't know of any girl of my generation with pierced ears. Yet men often ask about it. I think it indicates an indifference to what is going on in the feminine world. What if I should ask, "Do you wear a fob on your watch?"

TO GO WITH MY EARRINGED but unpierced ears I generally like tailored clothes and, even for formal evenings, simple gowns. I have a few fluffy things in my wardrobe but there will never be more than a few because I think they are effective only if worn sparingly . . . for special occasions. It's sort of a "making-your-entrance" gown, and if you want it to be effective you can't be dramatic every day in the week. Sometimes like my taste in flowers; I like roses and sweet peas equally, but I prefer the light fragrance of sweet peas most of the time and the scent of roses only on occasion. That way, when I do smell a rose, a rose is a rose is really a rose—which is what Gertrude Stein really meant maybe when she first wrote it that way!

For this reason I don't much care about spectacular dresses . . . or any clothes which overshadow the wearer. I like to have people notice me before they notice my dress . . . or at least reasonably soon afterwards. You take the hat with the feather in it shooting skywards; it's provocative, all right, catches the eye immediately. But I am also certain that the more intelligent understand it for what it is actually—an artificial way of attracting attention which, in the long run, would be far more complimentary if caught and held by personality. Maybe I have put this too flatly. I'm not against feathers, or any gay eye-catching devices, as such. In a way these are the marks of femininity. But I'm against just these with nothing to back them up. You put a feather in your hat and catch a man. But if he's worth anything you won't be able to catch him with just a feather. I'm still not making myself clear, I suppose. Oh, well . . . a rose is a rose is a rose!

Curls are made—not born—nowadays! To make your next home permanent easier, use Co-ets—handy cotton squares—to apply waving solution and neutralizer. Co-ets are made of finest cotton . . . are just the right size, keep their shape, don't drip! At drug and cosmetic counters everywhere.

SUPPOSING I'VE CAUGHT MY MAN and it is now time for us to get a home (with writers these things happen fast). What kind of home do I want? I have often thought that I'd like a neat but not glittery place, that there must be one spot I can muss, like a den. Size doesn't bother me much except that the more moderate the better, I am sure. I know I don't want it filled with a thousand things that must be fussed over and cleaned and walked past on tiptoes. There is such a thing as being a slave to one's home if it is filled with all the bric-a-brac and nonsense you can get today. A woman should be able to turn to better things, should have the time for it. A home to me is a way of living as much as it is a place to live in. Its material contents are not one tenth as important as the human contents.

But I am outspeeding my column, as well as the imaginative life I am leading in it. I have given myself a husband without going through the trouble of selecting him. How is this done? The selecting, I mean. The way girls complicate their lives achieving this objective reminds me of another verse written by another friend (I hope you don't mind—I think there isn't enough poetry in the world anyway and it should be used whenever possible):

How the gods must laugh
At their puppets irked,
Who harder jump
Than the strings are jerked.

IN OTHER WORDS, how we primp and fuss and rave trying to achieve a very simple goal—happiness. Just happiness. That's all. The blueprint is far from involved. A girl grows up, love is born, there is marriage, she keeps house, has children... and there it is. So why does life consist of passing from one problem to another? It starts when you are a child and I don't suppose it ever quits. Young boys don't worry too much, but young girls, I know, grab for their problems way ahead of time. Take my case.

Should I be a manicurist? (This was at ten.) Oh, I had to be a manicurist; how else could I be happy? Should I be a girl jockey? (This was at 14, I think, after riding a beautiful pony and feeling like the tallest girl in the world.) Oh, yes. I was certain that nothing else could give me that same, wonderful, exalted feeling. Should I be a lady gardener and grow beautiful roses and sweet peas and just live a gentle, peaceful life all by myself? (This at 15, when I decided I was through with boys.) On and on I went, going through different phases, being 20 kinds of person and never realizing I was wasting good time and energy just fencing with shadows. Because whether I am a lady gardener or a girl jockey has very little to do with my chances for happiness. I know this because the fact, for instance, that I finished up surprisingly as a movie actress doesn't in the least alter the main problem... the problem of setting one's mature life on a socially and emotionally rewarding level. Every angle of the problem remains... including a few special ones. I think. I mean I still have to find the man—or he find me—and in Hollywood this is not as easy as other places perhaps... not that it is easy anywhere. Hollywood is a place where there is a commercial value put on exactly the thing you first look for in a person... his personality. It takes a little longer here, when you meet a person, to decide whether they are for real or for sale. Inasmuch as I wouldn't necessarily want to marry the same man I wouldn't at all mind starring opposite, it becomes a bit of a problem to decide which he is.

I THINK I AM HONEST, yet I know I am not as honest as I could be... there are too many chances to hurt the feelings of people here. I have had to learn to fit into the general life of the film colony, just as everyone else has, and very likely a boy, who might otherwise like me, looks upon me with suspicion instead. I have often gone to gatherings where there were mostly non-professionals and noticed men I would like to meet. But it seemed to me they were wary of me. We might be introduced and we might talk, but rarely with any feeling of really getting to know each other.

ONCE THERE WAS A BOY I felt very much like encouraging. In fact, when time passed and I heard nothing from him I played around with the idea of calling him. And this, of course, brings up that old and unfair situation between the sexes. You can't phone such a fellow and say, "Remember me? I met you at Soandso's party. How would you like to do something Saturday night?" You can't do it. I'll break down and tell you that I have even tried it once about four years ago... you can't do it! If it didn't scare the guy it certainly puzzled him. I got plain nowhere.

"Who?" he asked.
"Rosetta Jaedos," I replied. "You know... I met you... (et cetera and et cetera)."
"Oh." (Long pause... followed by hemming and hawing followed by embarrassed and unsuccessful attempts on my part to end the conversation without exposing the fact that I felt like a fool.)

Ugh! That's what I thought about myself right then!

There is, besides the boy, the problem of whether you are definitely ready for marriage. For a career girl this becomes a very sharp problem. No, a career isn't everything. But it is something. You can pour a lot of yourself into it and you can get a lot of satisfaction out of it. It is something to think about... tossing it aside, or even shunting it to a less important place in your life.

I have a girl friend who thinks everyone is born with a romantic pill in them, and that when the pill breaks they know they are grown up and it is time to marry and settle down. I am partial to another theory, the buzzer theory, myself. I think we all have a buzzer inside of us that starts ringing the moment we are born, so faintly at first we are only partly affected by it (we play with dolls and like bright ribbons in our hair), and so steadily later that we have become used to it. But a day comes when something turns on the volume sharply and you are buzzing all over. I have been conscious of a buzzing for some time now... but is it as loud as it is going to get? Am I all buzzed up or just partially? That's what I want to know. Isn't this why a girl isn't sure that the boy she likes today will still be the boy she likes tomorrow?

The problem becomes even increasingly complicated. Girls are supposed to spend most of their time wondering about the boy they like, when and if they have picked one. If the truth were told I think they spend an equal amount of time, perhaps even more, wondering if they like him. To paraphrase the philosophers, the proper study of a girl in love is self. I don't want to go around putting words into the mouths of philosophers but I do have a feeling that if the question, "Do I love him?" were asked more often, the question, "Does he love me?" would be put a lot less. Of course there is a good reason why the second question is asked so many times more. If the answer to that is "yes, he loves you," it is quite a compliment. But the answer to the first question can't mean as much. If it is "no, I don't love him, you're no place. And if it is, "yes, I do love him," where does it leave you if you don't know how he feels about you?

Way at the beginning of this column I said something about left turns in traffic. I have finally decided this all is caused by the fact that the left side is the side your heart is on. And in anything affecting the heart... who knows which way to turn?

(Piper Laurie is currently starring with Tyrone Power in Universal's Mississippi Gambler.)

Rock shook his head. "I just do the 'La-La-Las,' and leave," he said. "I didn't know I was anything yet."

ANOTHER thing that puzzles him is the proprietary interest fans sometimes take in stars they like. The first time he ever made a personal appearance a girl in the audience yelled, "Stand up straight, Brown-Eyes!" and Rock reddened, thinking he was being jeered. Later he realized it was earnest, interested advice. He has since been fighting off the tall man's tendency to slouch. When he went to England for a picture the cry was, "Get a haircut!" He wishes there were some way of telling fans that this isn't wise, except for specific pictures. Right after his start in Hollywood he was advised to keep his hair long because, "... you can never tell when you might be wanted for a quick Western and no actor with a dude trim would have a chance for a role." Rock stayed away from the barber and sure enough every job that came along for a while required him wild and woolly. "I hate walking around with tassels hanging down the back of my neck but walking around without work is even worse."

None among Rock's forebearers, whom he can vaguely trace back to England, Ireland and Switzerland, were ever actors as far as he has learned. "I'm the first," he says. "or, at least, I will be as soon as I learn a little more about the business." Because he figures that everything that happened to him in his younger life contributed to the man he is today, he leaves no phase of his background unmentioned when questioned about it. He counts himself not only a graduate of New Trier High School in Winnetka but also of the pool room in back of Schmidt's tansorial parlor there, as well. He also knows that because his parents divorced when he was a child and his mother worked at a full time telephone job after a remarriage, leaving him a daytime orphan, a lot of parental supervision was missing in his adolescent and teen-age development. "There wasn't as much law and order as there should have been," he says, "and I guess my favorite hobby was staying away from home." He remembers he used to resort to technicalities about promises to behave. Given a licking once for being caught smoking behind a door he promised never again to smoke ... adding under his breath, "Behind a door."

To please his mother he joined the Boy Scouts as a lad but in three years failed to rise above the grade of tenderfoot much to her bewilderment. What she didn't know was that on scout nights Rock ran off to his street gang instead of going to meetings to pick up the lore of woodcraft and knot-tying. It was a sad day for him when his mother innocently bought him a complete scout uniform as a surprise present. Now he had to leave home on scout nights dressed in an outfit that practically made him unacceptable to his favorite cronies. "I had to wear it, of course," he recalls. "And there I was on scout nights, walking out of the house in an outfit that I was afraid the guys I ran around with would tear off my back."

Rock liked his fun as a kid. He had to work all the way through school to help out with the family income but he was also the kind of student who did his homework in study hall not only because he had jobs to attend to, but because he didn't like homework. Running around as he did he not only approached the borderline of trouble a few times but practically stepped over it. One night he went into Chicago with a bunch of kids who invaded

Marshall Fields, the city's biggest department store, and thoughtlessly dared each other to make free with the merchandise on the counter. Within minutes they were corralled and herded into the store manager's office. What they had taken were such knickknacks as bobby pins, greeting cards, shoe horns and a Rover Boys book. More annoyed than angry, the store people lectured them severely and sent word all the way to Winnetka for their parents to come and fetch them.

Rock's father had moved to Los Angeles after the divorce and during his junior year at high school Rock visited him, entering high school there to continue his studies. Rock, a good swimmer, and inspired by the successes of Johnny Weismuller, Jon Hall and Buster Crabbe, used to wonder idly about the movies during his California visit but just as easily would forget about it. He returned to Winnetka for his senior year and had to study an extra semester to graduate. He had been tripped up on one subject—history. Right after he got his diploma he set out to help make it; he joined the Navy. Following a preliminary period as a young hopeful in aviation around Glenview Naval Training Station in California he found himself in the South Pacific, mostly in a remote Philippine installation, helping to lick the Japs by stiffening the admiral's linens with the proper amount of starch.

Hollywood made a casual contact with Rock early in his Navy enlistment—just enough to give him a bit of a thrill. He was writing the morning flight schedule on a blackboard at Glenview one morning when someone tapped his shoulder. Turning around he saw, and recognized Robert Taylor, then a flying instructor, with the rank of Lieutenant, (j.g.).

"Hello," said Taylor. "I've just been assigned to this station. Can you show me around?"

"Sure," blurted Rock. Then remembering navy manual ... "Sorry ... I mean, yes sir!"

"That's okay," said Taylor. "I often have trouble with my lines, too."

AFTER the war Rock made his home with his father, who had opened an appliance store in Long Beach, while his mother came out to live in Pasadena and join the telephone company there. He tried to get into the University of Southern California under the GI bill, but the entrance requirements were too tough for a guy who had spent an awful lot of study nights not studying. This reduced him automatically to a full loafing membership in the popular 52-20 Club until he got the trucking job. All this time, for nearly two years after he got out of the Navy, people he met would often throw a very unoriginal remark at him which he would dismiss as just talk. It was, "You know ... you ought to be in the movies." One day he didn't dismiss it. Instead he asked himself, "I wonder?"

"I still think they were kidding," he says, "but, anyway, that's what triggered the idea."

He had no idea of how to go about it and for a starter tried hanging around the gates of the studios on his days off in the hope that some film men would stop and talk. Some did ... the gatekeepers. They would come out of their little shanties and invite him to take a walk away from there.

By a circuitous route, involving friends, acquaintances, and here and there a friendly stranger, he eventually found himself in front of a talent scout named Henry Wilson.

In the case of great talent discoveries there are always different stories about what was said and done. It is a fact, however, that Wilson did something about Hudson; he failed to interest David Selznick in him, got only a mild reaction from Walter Wanger, but induced director Raoul Walsh to sign Rock for a picture bit.

"The main thing is . . . can you ride a horse?" asked Walsh.

"Yes," replied Rock, wondering how fast he could learn.

It was all right. By the time the picture was made it was called Fighting Squadron and had to do with flying. All Rock had to say his first day was one line of dialogue: "You better get a bigger blackboard." On his 28th attempt he got it right. Walking off the set he approached Wilson, who was visiting, and said, "I was terrible, wasn't I?"

"Awful," agreed Wilson, pleasantly.

Rock stared off disconsolately towards the sky which was appropriately full of smog. "I guess it's back to the truck for me," he murmured.

"It would be, except that Walsh is using that shot he took of you," commented Wilson. "And if he is using that one he'll need you in other scenes to tie up with the story. That means you're going to have a few more chances and you are going to improve."

"I am?" questioned Rock unbelievably.

"Naturally . . . you couldn't be that bad again."

Rock wasn't. Walsh thought he had a screen personality that would come through sharply as soon as he overcame problems of acting and poise. In addition to ordinary difficulties Rock had some which were peculiarly personal. He was so tall he had a tendency to lean over the other characters, and so generally huge he was practically a background all by himself. And then there's his left-handedness.

IN the movies characters are always right-handed—unless the story specifies a left-handed person for plot purposes. Rock has tried to conform with only partial success. You may see him pretend to write with his right hand but he has difficulty even pretending to eat with it or do anything else requiring skill except, maybe, throwing a baseball. If it's a hard ball he throws it right-handed, but a softball he throws lefty. He has no idea why. In his efforts to correct himself he has had many an amusing experience.

But Walsh and Wilson persevered with Rock, keeping him on a $125-a-week salary even when he wasn't working. When Walsh had to sail for England for a film, he sold Rock to Universal-International for $9,500 representing his and Wilson's investment in him. Two executives of Rock's studio discussed him soon after this.

"Do you suppose we'll ever get our money out of this boy?" asked one. "And how will we go about it?"

The other man looked out of his office window to see Rock just passing. Some studio secretaries were on the studio street too. Their faces lit up as they approached Rock. They smiled as one when they drew even with him. And they kept turning around after they had gone by. The producer left the window with a satisfied chuckle.

"We'll let nature take its course," he said.

It has. Rock is helping out by studying diction and dramatic technique besides singing. He is also doing something about his social life. Right now he is "baching" it in a small, sun-drenched house atop one of the Hollywood Hills. He eats a lot, plays a lot, and sleeps deeper than any alarm clock can dig him out. But he feels the need of a better regulated existence. "I bet that's the way you feel when you are starting to think about getting married," he said the other day. For his first step in that direction he planned to turn in his red convertible for a more conservative model. "Maybe a cream-colored convertible," he said. Then, with a frown, "No, that's too flashy, I guess. Say, a dark green. That would be right." END

The words were no sooner out of her mouth than Mrs. Tom Lewis realized she had pulled a boner. From the look on their faces it was obvious that she had shaken the Ewings' confidence in her judgment, for the Ewings had seen Santa Monica and while they had liked the community, it had left them cold, particularly the beachfront property which is traversed by a four-lane highway.

IT takes time to know about beachhouse living, and Loretta sensed that this particular understanding was outside the ken of Rosalind's visitors. As a matter of fact, few tourists who come out to Hollywood and visit the beach can understand why so many big-name movie stars insist upon having an all-year house on the shores of the Pacific. And yet in the past decade, Cary Grant, Randolph Scott, Ginger Rogers, Marion Davies, Robert Young, Darryl Zanuck, the Warner brothers, Norma Shearer, the Talmadge sisters, practically any movie star you can mention, has lived down at the beach.

It was therefore inevitable that sooner or later, Loretta Young would join the long list of waterfront residents. She says living at the beach "is only temporary for us." However living anywhere is "only temporary" for Loretta. Like her mother Mrs. Gladys Belzer, a crack interior decorator who buys homes, decorates them, lives in them for a few months and then sells them at a handsome profit, Loretta seems incapable of occupying any one house for more than a few years.

Last year she and her husband began building two homes, one, an eight-room weekend house at Ojai, California, and the other, an apartment house on Sunset Boulevard in which they intend to occupy a duplex.

While construction of these two buildings was underway, Loretta signed a contract with Universal-International (Because of You and It Happens Every Thursday are her first two films under the deal) and her husband organized a television production company. Since they'd sold their large home in Beverly, they needed another.

"Tom realized," Loretta says, "that because of our heavy work schedule we wouldn't have time during the summer to take the children away on a vacation. He therefore suggested that we take a beachhouse, and I must say things have worked out so well that we're still living in it. After a workday of petty irritations coming home to the beach is like entering another world. On weekends I climb into sports clothes, and I'm telling you I feel so good, no one can induce me to dress up or drive 15 miles into town for a dinner or a fashion show. Actually, by giving the beach house as an excuse I find that I avoid a lot of senseless chasing around."

IN decorating her beachhouse Loretta did a job that most professional decorators would be happy to claim as their own. In every other house her mother has helped a good deal, but this time Mrs.

Belzer was away in Europe, and Loretta was anxious to prove that she could decorate a house by herself.

After studying the large empty rooms, she decided to maintain the color scheme of gray-green walls and blue-green carpets which lent a cool tone to the living room. She also took some of her expensive French provincial antique pieces and had them reupholstered in coarse, knobby fabrics that matched the pale walls and seemed suitable for beach living. She wanted to create the effect of walking out of the hot outdoor sun into a cool, informal living room.

Once the room was finished, Loretta wasn't particularly happy with the result. Her sisters and friends assured her it was beautiful, but still she wasn't convinced. Then one evening—it was after a dinner party—she received a gift of bright coral gladioli. The flowers looked so sensational that, "I knew immediately what the room lacked. It needed one large splash of color to give it character."

The next afternoon Loretta rushed to one of her mother's fabric wholesalers and with a gladiolus for a sample, bought a bolt of coral-colored upholstery material. With the help of 67-year-old Mrs. Mason who sews by the day for the family, Loretta covered two chairs and a stool, and only then did she feel "the room was right."

Despite the fact that she may not occupy one particular home for any great length of time, the actress always gives the impression of permanency to her environment. In the beachhouse, for example, she used as many of her priceless antiques as good taste would permit, and when Loretta Young uses antiques—she really uses them. She has no patience with collectors who consider their heirlooms too fragile or rare for practicality. She is one woman who believes in making the old pieces earn their keep. She took a French armoire and converted it to a bar. Her round game table is used for small luncheon servings. Her Chinese tea canisters are lamp bases, and her fabulous collection of white and green opaline boxes hold the cigarettes and candy.

One of her best decorating tricks, and this is worthy of emulation, concerns her three 18th Century English magazine racks which she employs to keep clutter away from her table tops. One magazine rack holds records, another holds magazines, and the third is used to store a varied assortment of portraits and photographs which most families paste in albums.

ESSENTIALLY Loretta Young is a traditionalist in her choice of furnishings, but a few seasons ago, down in Palm Springs, she met the Chicago architect, Sam Marx, and with him began an argument on the merits of modern versus traditional.

Marx is rather eloquent as architects go, and he kept baiting and chiding Loretta for her preference.

"I'll tell you what," he said, "I have some water colors down here. You look through them and pick out what you think is best."

Loretta selected a very modern composition. "You see," Marx scolded, "you really like modern design when you open your mind to it. Inherently you have very catholic tastes. Give those tastes free rein and you'll choose good modern just as you choose good antiques."

Months later, Sam sent the Lewises the painting that now hangs in their front hall. "Each time I look at it," Loretta says, "I remember to keep an open mind."

As an illustration of how genuinely broad-minded she's become, Loretta is currently mixing modern and traditional. A few years ago she would have considered this heresy. Now, the dining room table that will go into her new town house is completely contemporary. It's made of painted glass tiles and she plans to use Chippendale chairs around it. Currently she also uses a round black lacquer coffee table in her living room to match a modern black TV cabinet.

In Hollywood it is no secret that many movie stars like to visit Loretta Young in order to come home with a fresh decorating trick.

Loretta has developed many of these, but even more emulative than her decor gimmicks is her moving technique. Having had the experience of setting a large household half-a-dozen times in the past few years, she knows the value of foresight and planning, and she's reduced these to a little science all her own.

"I always work out the furniture arrangements on paper first," she explains. "I draw the room and furniture pieces to scale and do all the heavy moving with a pencil. On moving day I know just where things should go and, if need be, I give the diagrams to the moving men and let them follow my drawings."

She makes it a rule to settle the kitchen and dining rooms first, "because those are the two rooms that must function smoothly if the family's to be kept in good humor." After that comes her husband's study and then the living room and the bedrooms.

DURING the last move to the beach house, Loretta experimented with a little psychology on her husband. "You know, Tom," she said, "it takes a good two weeks at least before we can get everything settled in this house so that things are running smoothly."

Knowing what to expect, Tom didn't complain or gripe about the confusion.

When the house was running smoothly after one week (which is what Loretta expected originally) Tom came to her and said, "You know, honey, moving around isn't so bad after all."

"Wait until he sees what happens next time," Loretta cautions. "After the beach house, we're moving into two different places simultaneously."

Big Sleep, Janie Gets Married, Night And Day, Two Guys From Texas, One Sunday Afternoon, and she was infinitely better known in the movie colony than Scott Brady, who was usually pointed out as the brother of Lawrence Tierney. But she handled the situation with such aplomb,

I SAW IT HAPPEN

While on vacation, we stopped to look around historic Hyde Park. In one of the rooms I noticed a tall man standing with his back to us, inspecting the late President Roosevelt's model ship collection. He was attired in spotless white flannels and a pink sport shirt, presenting a sharp contrast to the more conventionally dressed people milling around the beautiful house.

"Jeepers," said a teen-age girl standing nearby, "just look at the white pants over there. Who does he think he is—a movie star or something?"

The man turned around and grinned broadly at her. It was Zachary Scott.

such good humor, such graciousness that Brady fell head over heels in love with her. And the simple truth is that although he's dated some 200 different girls since that afternoon, Dorothy Malone is still the great love of his life.

"I'd marry her tomorrow," he says, "if she'd have me. Only she has her doubts, not only about me, but about living in Hollywood. She's a Texas girl, and she's really crazy about Dallas.

"I go out with other girls, of course. But that's because Dorothy's in Texas so much of the time. I sure wish she'd make her mind up and marry me. I may look tough on the outside but underneath there beats a heart of gold."

Scott Brady and Dorothy Malone have been seeing each other on and off for more than four years now. At the beginning, Scott was in no position to get married. He'd loused himself up with a contract at Eagle-Lion. "It cost me $25,000 to buy myself out. I've already paid them $20,000 and have another $5,000 to pay. Then I'm free and clear." He had no assurance that he could make a go of his screen career. He was only 23, and emotionally an impetuous and immature youngster. He's grown up a lot since then.

In the past four years, however, Lawrence Tierney's kid brother has come a long, long way up the success ladder. He's under contract to 20th Century-Fox for one picture a year at $25,000 per. He's just walked out of a fat long-term contract at Universal-International. He's wanted for films at Warners, Paramount, and Metro. His agent, Johnny Darrow, the man who discovered Van Johnson, Gene Kelly, June Allyson, Gene Nelson, and Elaine Stewart, says, "It looks very much as if Scott'll soon be pulling down 40 grand a job. More important than the money is the kid himself. He's learning to control his temper. He's keeping his nose clean. He's developing into a man of character and stature. Four years ago he was a pretty wild kid. But even then he had talent. He's got temper and flash, all right, but that's the seat of his acting ability.

"No doubt a girl like Dorothy Malone could settle him down. But he's only 27, and there's always time for marriage. One of the good things about marrying a girl like Dorothy would be that she'd have a good effect on his character. She'd keep him in line. She'd keep him working. There's a girl everyone likes. She's got a wonderful sense of values. The guy who gets her is getting a wonderful wife."

Why won't Dorothy Malone marry Scott Brady? Why hasn't she already? Admittedly she cares for the tall, good-looking Irishman or she wouldn't maintain their four-year relationship. Each time she flies into Hollywood from Texas, Scott is waiting at the airport, and they spend all their free time together. Both are 27. Both are Catholics. Both love each other. Why hasn't all of this been consummated in wedlock?

DOROTHY SAYS, "I just can't make my mind up." She lets it go at that, but a girl-friend who knows her very well and attended Highland Park High School with Dorothy is a bit more specific.

"Dorothy thinks Gerry is a very wonderful guy," this informant says. (Most girls refer to Scott by his popular nickname Gerry.) "But deep down she knows that there's a world of difference between them, a wide gap they may never bridge."

A friend of Brady's to whom I showed the above quotation says, "I agree with much of that, but I don't believe that such a marriage would be a mistake. Right now, Dorothy Malone is a little above Scott in . . . let's call it background. But this kid is nobody's fool. He is ambitious, industrious, and thrifty. No one ever sees him throwing his dough around. He lives in a small Hollywood house, pays maybe $100 or $125 a month rent, drives a Pontiac convertible, and is very good to his mother.

"He's seen what alcohol and dissipation have done to other potentially good guys. He knows that as soon as he steps out of line he's going to get his ears flattened.

"The kid knows all that, which is why he's become extra careful, extra cautious. I admit that he's been in trouble with dames a couple of times, but what young guy hasn't. They're making a big fuss right now about his leaving U-I. 'Who does this Scott Brady think he is?' they ask. 'A big shot?'

"It's a very simple story. U-I has been putting Brady in a lot of films in which he's played the heavy. Some of these films haven't been too good. They told him that eventually they'd give him hero parts. A picture like The Golden Blade comes up. Farley Granger is borrowed from Sam Goldwyn to play the lead. Farley reads it. 'Not for me,' he says. 'Not for me in a thousand years.' Okay, this is Brady's chance. He goes down to Bill Goetz who's in charge of production at the studio. 'Can I play the lead?' he asks Goetz. You know what happened? Goetz says, 'I'm sorry. The part goes to Rock-Hudson.' That's when Brady squawked. 'Okay,' Goetz says, 'if you don't like the way we're treating you here, we'll tear up your contract.' 'That's fine with me,' Brady says. And that's just what happened.

"They say the kid likes to fight, that he's got a chip on his shoulder. Nothing of the sort. He got out of his contract at Eagle-Lion because they were putting him in one lemon after another. He realizes that after he finished his contract there, he'd be finished for good. He got out even though it cost him dough. That's the way he felt about U-I. What's the sense of being typed as a heavy? It's a living, sure, but for how long?

"But back to this Dorothy Malone. I know this: If Dorothy has strong doubts, she shouldn't marry the guy. But I honestly feel that once he got married he'd settle down. I know he dates a lot of girls. So what? It's a good idea for a young man to sow his wild oats.

"The trouble with a lot of these Hollywood guys is that they never sowed any wild oats. After they got married they began to regret their unspent youths. They felt they'd been cheated. What happens? They get divorces. Look at Kirk Douglas. Look at Robert Taylor. They date a lot of girls, too—only they're about ten years too late. If they'd played the field when they were young, they'd probably still be married today."

THERE you have both sides of the coin. Actually he is a mixture of virility, childishness, good humor, an urbane sharpness, unbridled ambition, and not too much formal education. He had no trade, no occupation to speak of when he went into the Navy, and when he came out, he had some $700 in his pocket. Period.

I remember very well when Hal Wallis saw him in a restaurant after the war and had him tested. Scott photographed very well but he sounded like a Dead End Kid. He was quick to realize, however, that with his mental and physical equipment an acting job would pay off better than practically any other trade. He therefore enlisted in the Bliss-Hayden Dramatic School under the G.I. Bill. Ten months later he was under contract to Eagle-Lion.

Fortunately for Scott, he has one of the shrewdest agents in the business. Johnny Darrow has been around a long time, and as long as Brady is tutored by him, his career will go places—that is if he can stay out of trouble; and in Hollywood most trouble begins with a woman.

Not too long ago, Scott was out with an attractive young girl who threatened to accuse him of criminal assault unless he turned over to her a fat wad of money.

Brady was absolutely guiltless. Ann Blyth, Lucille Bannister, Yvonne De Carlo, Shelley Winters, Mona Knox, Piper Laurie, Yvonne Rivero—any of the girls who have dated him can testify to his gentlemanly conduct. Some unknowing, inexperienced young actor might have succumbed in panic to this shakedown, but not the son of a former policeman, not a tall, good-looking kid who used to play end for the Roosevelt High football team up in the Bronx. He marched down to the District Attorney's office, told the city official what had happened, and today that girl and her accomplice are scheduled to stand trial—not on the attempt to blackmail Scott Brady, because Scott wouldn't press the charge, but on another and even more serious charge.

Hollywood and the road to success are beladen with many pitfalls. A man needs a wife to help avoid many of them. With Dorothy Malone at his side, it would be easier for Scott. But Dorothy or not, here is one young actor who will make the top rungs. He has a fighting heart. "Quit" is one word conspicuous by its absence in his vocabulary.

Scott Brady can be seen in Universal-International's Untamed Buccaneer.

Another Modern Screen Special!
An intimate report on the private lives of top television personalities

THE WOMEN IN JACKIE'S LIFE: Jackie Gleason, CBS TV's new star comedian, has a wife and two daughters, and practically nobody knows it!

The columnists often noted that Jackie dated this glamor girl and that one, or that he spent his evenings around the bar at Toots Shor's Restaurant—but they forgot that Jackie is still married to his childhood sweetheart, Genevieve. The Gleasons' marriage has been an on-and-off affair for years, and Jackie traveled alone on most of his cafe and theater engagements and during his period at Warners' studios in Hollywood. In recent years, Jackie has tried earnestly to be a good father to his two daughters, Linda and Geraldine, and even had the eldest, Linda, on his TV show when it was on DuMont network. Mrs. Gleason used to come around to rehearsals, too, whenever she had time.

But, despite attempts at reconciliation, the Gleasons are apart most of the time, and Jackie maintains a bachelor apartment in his swanky duplex penthouse office in the Park Sheraton Hotel. Because of their religion, divorce does not seem to be imminent. Jackie, too, is a steady churchgoer, a sincere practitioner of his faith.

In the big money for the first time and with a fabulous 3-year CBS contract in his pocket, Jackie is working hard at making his show a great one. He relaxes by hanging around Shor's and by throwing mad, lavish parties for his pals and gals. And he is down to a snappy 190 pounds, compared to the 240 he used to lug around a couple years ago.

DAGMAR SAGS: The big bust of the TV season is Jenny Lewis, better known as Dagmar. Her last TV show flopped and she has found it necessary for the first time to hire a press agent. Dagmar, who looked positively immense the last time she was on TV, will have to shed some weight if she expects to rejuvenate her career. She is living quietly in a big apartment off Central Park, with husband Danny Dayton—a far cry from the time she was earning $3,500 a week! The trouble with Dagmar is that she just hasn't the talent to head a big show. She can't sing; she dances only fairly well; and she's not a trained comedienne.

ROBERT MERRILL IS BACK: Robert Merrill, the handsome young Metropolitan Opera baritone last seen in Paramount's Aaron Slick From Punkin' Crick, is making the rounds again. For years one of the nation's most eligible bachelors, Bob surprised his friends when he married singer Roberta Peters. It was a first marriage for both. Their quick break-up was another shock, and Bob disappeared when newspapers broke the story. Now he apparently is feeling okay, and is seeing old friends, but not dating any former girl friends. One thing he is adamant about—he won't discuss his marriage. (My guess: in-law trouble.)

JIMMY'S FAVORITE REDHEAD: Jimmy Durante may be 60, but there's still romance in his life! For a long time after his wife had passed on following a long illness, Jimmy was inconsolable. His marriage had been a rather unhappy one, due to the demands of his career and his wife's preference for staying at home when he had to go on the road.

When he was playing the Copacabana night club a few years ago, one of the checkroom girls, Margie Little, became his friend and, when Jimmy had to return to Hollywood, he invited Margie and her mother to come along. Margie, a former model who has a lovely figure, is the closest thing to a steady romance in Jimmy's life.

On TV, Jimmy may be cast as a comic lover to the Amazonian Helen Traubel or the heavyweight Sophie Tucker. But in real life he prefers them young and redheaded—which is exactly what Margie Little is.

GODFREY, FROM ALL ANGLES: The famous redhead, Arthur Godfrey, is seen by millions on CBS TV—his two evening programs being top-rated—but apparently he doesn't see enough of himself. So Arthur has had his New York hotel apartment fixed up with mirrors on the wall and ceilings. Now he can see himself from all angles! . . . Arthur, incidentally, may appear languorous and casual, but he is a demon for work. He is on the radio and TV more often than any other star, and has very little time for relaxing. In New York, he avoids the night clubs, benefit shows, and theatrical restaurants. Instead, he hides out at the Cub Room of the Stork, where he enjoys the company of his pal, Walter Winchell, and other celebrities.

HEART THROB FROM THE PAST: The next time you see Neil Hamilton on Hollywood Screen Test, ask your mom. She'll tell you about the silent movie days, when handsome Neil was the No. 1 Heart Throb. Neil was the original men's collar ad model, and went to Hollywood to become a big star. He did not do too well in the talkies, so when TV came along, Neil switched. He is now emcee of Hollywood Screen Test, the oldest continuously sponsored drama program on TV. Neil and his wife are now living quietly in an apartment in New Rochelle. Incidentally, Neil is a devout Catholic who attends church immediately after each Monday night telecast.

Warren Hull, Freddie Bartholomew, Conrad Nagel, Joe E. Brown, Lee Tracy, William Gar- gan, Roy Rogers are some of the other movie veterans who are concentrating on TV careers.

UNCLE MILTIE'S ROMANCE: Milton Berle, who made such a spectacular comeback in TV popularity this season, is still romancing the attractive RKO publicity girl, Ruth Cosgrove. But I predict there won't be wedding bells—for a while. Milton is still carrying the torch for the beautiful and blonde Joyce Matthews, whom he married twice and from whom he was twice divorced. Not only that, but Milton is utterly devoted to his mother, Sandra, and his little daughter, Vickie. What little time he has to spare, he gives to songwriting and to polishing a novel.

NANCY AND FRANK: A lot of Broadwayites are betting that Nancy Sinatra will not hurry to wed again. Is it because she hopes that, some day, Frankie will hurry back?

Frank, meanwhile, has been repairing the damage to his career by his last movie and by his tiffs with the press when he was courting Ava Gardner. He is more approachable now, more conscious of public relations, and has been picking up TV, theater and café work until he can set another movie deal. And, although his voice is holding up fairly well, he is eager to develop into a singing and dancing light comedian, like Gene Kelly, whom he worships. That's why Frank has been taking dancing lessons and working so hard in comedy scenes on TV.

JERRY LESTER AND TV: Another casualty of the TV season has been comedian Jerry Lester, a tremendously talented guy. Lester, under contract to NBC, has been getting more than $3,500 a week when he's not working. It seems he and NBC just cannot agree on the right format for a new TV show. His summer show was a poor one, and Jerry is now playing cafés.

Jerry's marriage broke up, and being away from his three children no doubt made him more irascible than ever. During his peak days, when the Open House show was so hot, Jerry alienated many of his friends by his supreme ego. He used to brag, "Next to Charlie Chaplin, I'm the greatest comedian in the world!"

Despite everything, his talent is so great, he will come back better than ever, I'm sure!

KITTY KALLEN AND BUDD: Kitty Kallen, the brunette singer touring with Martin and Lewis, manages to find time to be a good wife and mother. She is a Philadelphia girl whose career spiraled until she was starring at the Copacabana. Budd Granoff, young and handsome, was the press agent for the club and, following Kitty's engagement there, they had a date. This was the beginning of a blazing romance that culminated in quick marriage. They didn't plan having a baby right away, but Jonathan came along the first year, and Budd and Kitty have built themselves a charming house in Westwood, N. J., so Jonathan, now 3, can grow up in the suburbs.

MICKEY AND JANE: When Mickey Rooney married Elaine Mahnken, everybody was surprised, especially TV comedienne Jane Kean. Jane is a pretty, witty blonde, and she and Mickey had been romancing, on and off, for years. Mickey seemed to gravitate back to her between marriages, and he even proposed. But Jane wasn't ready for the Big Step, and stalled. So Mickey wandered off.

MARGARET TRUMAN'S FUTURE: Margaret Truman's TV career is a question mark. She has a contract with NBC, but everyone's wondering what will happen when the contract expires later this year. Meanwhile, she has made a lot of friends around Radio City. Jimmy Durante thinks she is a "swell guy" and found her easy to work with. The truth is that she has developed a flair for light comedy. So don't be surprised if she does less concert singing and more musical comedy stuff on TV.

DOMESTIC MARTHA RAYE: Although Martha Raye is pleased that her once-a-month NBC show is such a big hit, the most important thing in her life is her eight-year-old daughter, Melodye. Martha, who did such fine work opposite Charlie Chaplin in "Mons. Verdoux," has quieted down a lot. She is still the raucous hoyden when she works in her own night club, the "Five O'Clock" in Miami Beach. And, of course, she is a wonderful clown on TV. But, after each TV show, she hurries for the train back to Miami (she's afraid to fly), where she has established permanent residence. She devotes every afternoon to Melodye and takes her to Catholic church Sunday mornings—immediately after Martha finishes at the night club. She cooks and she sews, and even husband Nicky Condos dons an apron and presses Melodye's dresses!

BITS OF NEWS: The Fred Warings have drifted apart, after so many years . . . William Holden's new Paramount Pictures contract forbids TV appearances. Bill says it's okay with him; he never did think much of TV . . . Roy Rogers and Dale Evans have apparently quit making movies for theaters. Concentrating on their films for TV . . . Donald Buka has recovered from a broken nose, incurred when he was smacked hard during a fight scene on "Tales of Tomorrow" . . . Charlton Heston, who is in such great demand on TV, is sentimental about giving up his cold-water walk-up one-room apartment on West 45th Street near 10th Avenue in New York. Stays there when he's in town.

New Ipana Destroys Decay and Bad-Breath Bacteria

DECAY BACTERIA

IPANA DESTROYS THESE

Most dentists agree that tooth decay is caused by the acid-producing action of lactobacilli. Brushing regularly after eating with new Ipana safely destroys these decay-causing bacteria by the millions.

BAD-BREATH BACTERIA

IPANA DESTROYS THESE

Bad breath is commonly caused when bacteria like these ferment bits of food trapped in the mouth. New scientific tests prove Ipana Tooth Paste destroys these bacteria—and stops mouth odor hour after hour.

New, Exclusive, Bacteria-Fighting Formula! Your Teeth and Breath Stay Cleaner...You Reduce Decay Better.

THINK of the trouble, pain and expense of just one tooth cavity in your family. Think of how having unpleasant breath just "once in a while" can hurt you or your husband, even hold him back at work.

Then you'll know how important this news is to you.

Dental scientists have now proved beyond doubt that new creamy-white Ipana destroys decay and bad-breath bacteria.

A New, Exclusive, Formula

This new Ipana is an exclusive formula developed by Ipana scientists. It gives you a combination of bacteria-destroying agents not found in any other tooth paste.

Independent research authorities proved that regular after-meal brushing with new Ipana reduced bacteria in the mouth—including decay and bad-breath bacteria—by an average of 84%.

Amazing Results For YOU

Dentists generally will tell you that new Ipana effectively reduces tooth decay, when used regularly after meals.

In tests by an independent laboratory, just one brushing with new Ipana stopped offensive mouth odor even after 4 hours—in every single case.

So get a tube of new good-tasting, white Ipana today—for the mouth health of your whole family. Remember new Ipana destroys decay and bad-breath bacteria.

Penetrates to "danger spots." New Ipana's bacteria-destroying foam penetrates to hard-to-get-at "danger spots" where your tooth brush—or even water—can't reach. Thus it helps you have fewer cavities and a cleaner breath. And brushing teeth from gum margins toward biting edges with Ipana helps remove irritants that can lead to gum troubles.

2 to 1 choice for flavor!

Children love the taste of new bacteria-fighting Ipana. It was the 2 to 1 choice for flavor of thousands of families who tried it at home.

LOUELLA PARSONS' GOOD NEWS

LUCY'S BABY! . . . JUDY GARLAND'S MID NIGHT ANTICS . . . JUNE HAVER FACES A NEW LIFE . . .

WHEN Bing Crosby and Mona Freeman started playing golf and dining together quietly in Palm Springs, an irate voice telephoned and said:

"I thought you said Bing Crosby wouldn't marry again!"

I'll say it again, brother. But I didn't say he'd never again buy dinner for a pretty girl. All of a sudden, Mona is the most dated girl in town.

Nicky Hilton has flipped hard—as completely gone on Mona as he was on Liz Taylor in their courtship days—and just as jealous.

Mona and Nicky were sunning themselves at the pool at the Racquet Club in Palm Springs. A long distance call came to Mona from her ex, Pat Nerney, asking her if she'd have dinner with him when she returned to town.

Wham! Bang! Nicky hit the ceiling so high he dashed out of the place and drove back to

Los Angeles fuming furiously into the night.

And the very next night, Mona dined with Bing as Nicky fumed and fumed in Hollywood—this time as HE was on the long distance 'phone paging Mona in the cocktail lounge!

ALL the time I-Love-Lucy's baby was being born, Lucille Ball was fully conscious. She was given only a spinal anaesthesia, as it was a Caesarean section delivery.

Lucille kept heckling the doctor with "What is it?? What is it? It's gotta be a boy."

And the doctor kept saying, "Wait a minute, honey—now take it easy."

"Where's Desi?" from Lucille. "If it ISN'T a boy give HIM an anaesthesia."

When his Royal (TV) Highness, Desiderio Alberto Arnaz IV, put in his appearance, Desi burst into the corridor outside the operating room yelling loudly to relatives and script-writers:

"It's a boy! Hurray, we don't have to rewrite the script, fellows!"

JUDY GARLAND and Sid Luft are starting something new socially that hostesses hope won't become a fad. The Lufts are arriving at dinner parties around midnight—or later.

At the Jules Steins' dinner dance, Judy, Sid and Peter Lawford arrived as at least half the guests were leaving—and they all returned just on the chance Judy was going to sing—and she did, until the wee small hours.

Judy is much thinner and using an eyebrow make-up—straight instead of arched—that gives her a piquant Oriental look.

I asked Judy why she and Sid were showing up so late for parties—this wasn't the only time they'd done it.

"Oh, by the time we get through looking at the baby," she laughed, "that takes hours

Nicky Hilton's all in a twit over Mona Freeman . . . lots of fellows are. Among her admirers is Bing Crosby, who golfs and dines with her.

—and I take a short nap for my health, and the hairdresser does my hair and we get dressed—well, it's just midnight!"

Peter Lawford, who came with the Lufts as I said, didn't seem to mind at all that Rocky Cooper (whom he has sooooo long admired) was being obviously adored by another tall, dark, handsome and young admirer.

Another old flame of Pete's, Sharman Douglas, was also present—she, too, dancing every number with someone else.

THE few people who know June Haver best have realized for years that June has been squarely facing the question of whether she will continue her career—or put all material things behind her and enter a convent.

These friends now believe that little June quietly has made her decision.

Several weeks ago she put all of her personal possessions on the auction block.

Her contract with 20th Century-Fox is up this year.

She hasn't been seen around with a Hollywood beau in months.

How ironic it is that the gay, dancing, singing heroines June has played in so many movies have never come true for her in private life.

She suffered a nervous breakdown when her marriage to Jimmy Zito went on the rocks and almost suffered another several years later after the death of Dr. John Dusik whom she deeply loved. She has had many illnesses.

Always a deeply religious girl, June is turning deeper and deeper to her Catholic faith to sustain her.

I, for one, will not be surprised if she has decided to enter a convent.

Is poor Bob Stack's face red—and himself so good-looking, too.

At a recent public luncheon in Beverly Hills, he heaped sugar and cream into consomme—thinking it was the cup of coffee he had asked for. But Joan Fontaine and Anne Francis, sitting on either side of him, will never let him forget it!

AVA GARDNER wrote me a letter from Africa right after Frank Sinatra had to leave her again and return to Hollywood:

"I miss my guy," says the frank Ava, "but we were very happy while he was here. Maybe we needed to get away from civilization! I'm so glad he's coming home to a big movie job in From Here To Eternity. He'll show the world he's an actor as well as a singer.

"While he was here we slept on hard cots under mosquito netting and listened wide-eyed, and I'll admit a little frightened, while all sorts of wild animals roared outside our camp circle. We bathed in tiny canvas tubs and dined sitting on the ground.

"Africa, insofar as the natives are concerned, is certainly a man's land, Louella. I don't think any American housewife would ever again complain if she could see the way the native African woman lives.

"Most of the girls are married in their early teens after their fathers sell them to the highest bidder. "Believe me when I say—and I think I've had my troubles being married!"

IF this isn't typical of Shelley Winters, I'll eat the item.

On the list Shelley turned in there were 20 men and two girls.

IHAD the time of my life on a short trip back to New York and to Washington, D. C., for the Inauguration.

Just like any fan, I could hardly wait to see Bette Davis in her musical, Two's Company. I can't tell you how wonderful our great dramatic star is kicking up her heels, imitating Tallulah Bankhead watching Bette Davis, doing a hill-billy crone and otherwise cavorting as La Davis has never cavorted in the movies.

We had been friends for a long time in Hollywood, but I never had such an enthusiastic reception as Bette gave me, arms around necks, kisses on the cheek, etc., when I visited her backstage.

I've always said that when you're away from Hollywood everyone you see from movie-town seems like a long lost brother—or sister.

I also saw Shirley Booth in Time Of The Cuckoo and my money still says she's 1953's Oscar winner. If she makes her new Broadway show on the screen, she'll probably be a candidate again in '54—that's how good she is as an actress.

I went to the Drama Critics' Awards to Stanley Kramer and Fred Zinnemann as "best producer and director" of the year for High Noon ("best" movie winner).

I must say the award part was short and sweet. Give 'em the citations—then have fun.

WHEN I was in Washington for the Inaugural I heard on every side that Shirley Temple Black deeply resents some criticism from certain quarters because she took her child out of school just because the youngster was mentioned as appearing in a school play.

To her close friends, Shirley said, sticking out that firm little chin of hers, "I don't want my daughter to live my childhood—and I won't permit it."

If you ask me, this speaks volumes.

PURELY personal: Lana Turner never takes her eyes off her escort (currently Lex Barker) while dining. She doesn't need to watch her food because she just pushes it around the plate. Wonder if she eats FIRST at home. . . .

Isn't Terry Moore overdoing the "I'm a screwball, I'm completely gone" angle in her interviews? . . .

It's time Pier Angeli starts using lipstick particularly if she continues going to night-clubs where lights are dim anyway. . . .

There should be a law against comedians working themselves to death as witness Jerry Lewis, Red Skelton, Eddie Cantor. . . .

Mari Blanchard is the next Queen of Sex—if you can believe what you hear out at Universal-International. She's expected to be giving Marilyn Monroe a run for the title by this time next year. . . .

Rita Hayworth has plenty of money again—and little happiness. . . .

Betty Hutton wears the cutest cocktail hats—usually black and small, usually with tiny veils—but she manages to make them look so different. . . .

The all-time low in a public statement: Johnnie Ray's about his separation from Marilyn: "Don't blame her. This chick tried. She's the only girl who ever made me feel like a man. The chick tried to do everything to keep us together. But I'm on the verge of a breakdown trying to recapture that one hour of our honeymoon"—ad nauseam.

THE Letter Box: Betty Barker, Norfolk, Virginia, thinks Dean Martin is overly neglected in the team of Martin and Lewis. "Even the stories about both of them are mostly about Jerry," she complains, "and poor Dean, who is so handsome, so talented and so good natured, comes off second best." Don't believe I can go along with you on this, Betty. Dean is all you say, but he gets his share of adulation—and he'd be the first to say so.

Thank all of you who wrote such kind letters about my story on Bing Crosby. I deeply appreciate what you said.

Evelyn Weir, of Brooklyn, says that both MODERN SCREEN and I neglect Charlton Heston. "Not nearly enough news, gossip and interviews with him," complains Charlton's rabid fan.

Here are more addresses of boys in the service who would appreciate letters from Hollywood stars and/or fans:

C/O Pvt. Holland Browning, RA 13377349, Detachment No. 4, 352 Comm. Recon. Co., A.P.O. 301, c/o Postmaster, San Francisco, Calif.

1st Lt. John E. Hughes, 0995645, Btry A, 160 FA BN APO 86, c/o Postmaster, San Francisco.

And for a switch: Anne Brown, 10 Lulworth Drive, Pinner, Middlesex, England, will be delighted to write to service men who write her. She's 21, has brown hair, hazel eyes and is interested in music, the theater and movies.

That's all this month. See you next month.

Came June, it'll be "Mrs. Jim McNulty" that lovely Ann Blyth inscribes in an autograph book. Dr. Jim looks pretty smug at the thought. He squired her to The Jazz Singer, natch. His brother Dennis Day, who sent him through Medical School, introduced Jim to Annie three years ago.

NEW HELP FOR 4 "YOUNG SKIN" PROBLEMS

Young skin often turns into problem skin—just when a girl has a right to look her prettiest.

Oil glands begin to work overtime. Your skin seems always oily, shiny. Powder cakes and darkens.

Flaky particles pile up, roughen your skin, for it has become too sluggish to throw them off as it should.

Pores begin to show so. Dirt and oil, trapped by dead skin cells, clog and stretch the pore openings.

Blackheads and bumps can—and very often do—start to develop in the clogged pore openings.

Now—Pond's has worked out a remarkably effective treatment for these four young skin problems. It's greaseless. It's quick. And it works.

IN JUST 1 MINUTE

See your skin look fresher, brighter,
clearer.

Several times a week give your skin this quick treatment. Cover face except eyes—with a 1-Minute Mask of Pond's Vanishing Cream. The Cream's "keratolytic" action loosens . . . dissolves away dead skin cells! After 1 minute—tissue off. Now—pore openings are cleared of dead skin cells. Tiny skin glands can function normally. Your skin looks fresher, clearer, smoother!

Greasy make-up "coarsens" young skin. For a naturally pretty look, use greaseless Pond's Vanishing Cream for powder base.

An intimate report on the private lives of top television personalities

TV TALK by Paul Denis

PERRY COMO, WHO KNOWS WHAT HE WANTS! Perry Como, now 40, is a solid singer in more ways than one. He's not only been a top singing personality for the past ten years—having turned out eight records that sold more than a million copies—but he is also a solid citizen.

He does his three-times-a-week CBS TV show for Chesterfield, runs his own music publishing house, and earns about a million dollars a year. And does all this quietly, with dignity, and without hanging around night clubs or getting into headline-making squabbles.

The former barber from Canonsburg, Pa., knows what he wants: Enough money and time to enjoy home life with his childhood sweetheart, Roselle, and their children—Ronnie, 13, David, 7, and Terri, 5. They live in a big, pleasant house in Sands Point, Long Island, and he's home for dinner on his "off days"—Tuesdays and Thursdays. He's informal, and likes old friends around. He loves colored shirts and slacks, and doesn't own a dinner jacket. Around the house, he fusses with cameras. Outside of the house, he golfs, shooting in the 70s. He is active in the local church, and does much for charity—but shuns personal publicity. In fact, he has a press agent, the famed Harry Sobol, but uses him as a buffer for avoiding publicity contacts. He is so afraid publicity will ruin the normal life of his three kids that he won't invite photographers or interviewers to his home.

Despite his shyness, he is so beloved by the hard-bitten songpluggers of Tin Pan Alley, they put aside one full day a year for their Perry Como Golf Tournament. It's their way of saying, "You're a swell guy!"

JACKIE GLEASON'S GETTING TRIMMED: Jackie Gleason's taking a trimming—in weight, that is. The CBS TV star comedian is having the biggest fight of his life—against extra fat. Once 286 pounds, Jackie is down to a mere 220, and is determined to work down to a svelte 185. At one time, he tried a diet of steaks and clams, eating once a day and laying off liquor. But it wasn't enough. So he tried some psychological warfare. He bought a lot of size 44 suits, and threw away his size 56 suits. That gave him a goal: to be able to wear those size 44 suits comfortably. Everywhere he went, his pals asked, "Do you diet by exercising?" And Jackie would answer, "Heck, no. When I'm dieting, I'm so tired, I can't even stand up to exercise!" Lately, Jackie has taken even more drastic measures. He spends most of his week at Doctor's Hospital, where he diets under strict medical supervision. He's restricted to 600 calories a day. Of course, he's turned his hospital suite into an office, and has bedside conferences with his writers and staff. He leaves the hospital only for important business and for actual rehearsals.

Like Gleason, Dagmar has to fight a tendency to get too heavy. She loves to eat and cook, and staying around her big apartment a lot helps add weight. So, about once a year, she gets desperate and takes appetite-reducing pills—under medical supervision—and loses about two pounds a day. She quits when she's shed about 20 pounds. During the dieting, she hates to go out, explaining, "I'm cross when I'm dieting, so I'd rather stay home." Incidentally, Dagmar's weight is a big secret. Her 160-pound husband, Danny Dayton, says, "Two things Dagmar will never talk about—her weight and her age!" And Dagmar, when asked how heavy she is, always answers, "I fluctuate." Period.

MELINDA'S CAREER: Joan Bennett's pretty daughter, Melinda Markey after some modeling and TV work around New York, is realizing her ambition, finally, to make good on the stage. She's been touring in On Borrowed Time. Tiny-waisted Melinda, who will have a gorgeous figure when her baby fat fades away, spent a couple of years in New York. She lived at the Rehearsal Club, where young girls pay $17-a-week rent, and she shared a large (Continued on page 16)

"Kissing Sweet Breath" IN SECONDS

Leading universities proved: CLORETS banish bad breath odors due to ONIONS • SMOKING • ALCOHOL

You can prove this yourself by making this convincing KISS TEST:

Eat onions. Then chew CLORETS CHEWING GUM or eat CLORETS CANDY MINTS. Now exchange a kiss. You'll find your breath is "Kissing Sweet".

Remember, CLORETS contain true, water soluble chlorophyll*. It is not an imitation. Not synthetic. Insist on CLORETS. Chew them with complete confidence. CLORETS CHEWING GUM and CLORETS CANDY MINTS are delicious, refreshing, good.

(Continued from page 14) room with three other young actresses. She got a 35-cent-per-meal discount at the club, and she hung around the corner drug store, where she and other young actresses swapped tips on TV jobs. She had a lot of dates with young actors, and was proud of the fact that she was earning enough money to support herself. When her mother sent $130 for her last birthday, Melinda went on a shopping spree and spent it all on new dresses. She's partial to blacks and grays.

MEET TOM MORTON: Another product of TV is Tom Morton, who was tested by 20th Century-Fox after he had danced on the Chico Marx TV show. Morton, who is 25, five-foot-eleven, with black wavy hair and brown eyes, is carving out a movie career for himself. He's already made Wait Till The Sun Shines Nellie, The Stars Are Singing and Main Street To Broadway. Before Barbara Belle discovered him and became his manager, Tom was a chorus boy in Broadway shows and TV. He is a bachelor, and living with his mother in Hollywood. He spends virtually all his time improving his talents—toning up his dancing, his singing, and acting. Make a note of his name, girls. He's on the way up!

THE TV STARS: Danny Thomas made himself look bad when he blurted out, "Television is for idiots. I don't like it. It's a medicine show!" The fact is that Danny was worried and feeling very insecure about TV, when he first went into it. When his show did not draw the audience rating he felt he deserved, he blew his top . . . Marguerite Piazza, the beautiful opera singer, was stunned when her handsome husband, J. Graves McDonald, died suddenly on New Year's Eve. He was her second husband, father of her second child, and her manager as well. . . . Buster Crabbe has settled in New York, doing a lot of TV and dashing up to the Concord Hotel to run the spectacular pool and water sports there. . . . Johnny Ray's career is being endangered by his personal problems: marital problems and escapades that wind up in the police courts and the front pages. He'll probably do more TV this year, but he is asking for $12,500 per performance, and may not get too many offers. And, what is not generally known, is that he owns only 45% of his own gross income. The rest is controlled by managers.

THE MEN IN TV: Arthur Godfrey is still the top moneymaker in TV. His two TV shows and several radio shows for CBS bring him $1,400,000 a year. . . . Charlton Heston, who first made good in TV, is unhappy about having to give up his cold-water walk-up flat on West 47th Street. That little apartment, in a slum area, was Chuck's home during lean and good years, and he's very sentimental about it. . . . Tony Martin, who owns a terrific record collection, says his favorite disk is Johnny Long's "In Old Shanty Town," recorded back in 1938. . . . Frankie Thomas, who won TV fame as Frank Corbett, Space Cadet, is a movie veteran whose last film was Ginger Rogers' Major And The Minor. Now 25, Frankie is living in a New York apartment with his parents, and keeping busy with radio and TV work. He's a bachelor, and gets a load of fan mail. Some of the letters are so ardent, I can't repeat them in this column. . . . Sam Levenson, the folk humorist, is once more a daily newspaper columnist. He is the family-type humorist, and has a real happy family life. He, his wife Esther, their son Conrad, and their baby daughter live in an unpretentious private home in Brooklyn. Sam wanders in the neighborhood for bits of funny dialogue that he often uses in his monologues.

A NEW COMIC, FRANK FONTAINE: Tall, blond, handsome comedian on Scott Music Hall is Frank Fontaine. He's only 32, and he's been around for years, but it has been only lately that he has emerged as a highly talented funny man. He comes from a solidly show-business background. His father, Baron Fontaine, was a vaudeville singer; his grandfather was a circus strong man; and his wife, Alma, is a former acrobatic dancer. Unlike most other comedians, he believes in big families. He is already father of eight—count 'em—children. Six sons and two daughters, ranging from 1½ to 15. Already, his kids can do most of his comedy routines.

Frank had the whole family with him in Hollywood while he made seven movies, including the Martin and Lewis Scared Stiff, and brought them to home-town Boston when he had to come East for TV. Frank commutes from Boston to New York each week for his TV show, on which he co-stars with Patti Page, the recording star.

Another long-distance commuter is Martha Raye, who lives in Miami Beach and commutes by train (she's afraid to fly) to New York every fourth week for her NBC TV show.

BOB ALDA, PROUD DAD: It's hard to believe that handsome Robert Alda is father of a 17-year-old son, but it's true. Alan is a freshman at Fordham University, and studying acting and radio-TV. The boy is talented and wrote a complete musical show produced at Stepanik High School, White Plains, last year. Alan's off to a flying start, which is in sharp contrast to Bob's rough beginnings. Bob started as a singing usher at Loew's Orpheum, New York about 20 years ago, when I first met him. He was getting $3 extra a week for singing the band overture. Today, he has developed into a top actor and, in fact, did only acting on TV during 1952. Didn't sing a note. And, strangely enough, Bob quit the hit show, Guys And Dolls last September. He was the show's outstanding hit as singer-actor, but wants to become a producer. He will co-produce a Broadway show this Fall.

ODDS AND ENDS: Milton Berle is a happy guy again, now that his NBC TV show is back among the top-rated shows. Thanks to Goodman Ace, whose writing staff refashioned Miltie into a less brash, more likeable comedian, Miltie is King again. He is still dating Ruth Cosgrove, and they took a Miami Beach vacation together. He gave her a car for a surprise gift, and everybody felt they would tie the knot—but nothing happened. . . . Imogene Coca, after recovering from an emergency appendectomy, is back with Max Liebman's wonderful Show Of Shows on NBC. . . . Sid Caesar, her co-star, has another reason for rushing home nights: his baby son. Sid and Florence Caesar do most of their entertaining at home, where the fun usually comes from showing kinescopes of Sid's TV shows, followed by a wisecracking analysis of each performance.

Ed Sullivan, first newspaper columnist to become a TV star (his CBS show is Toast Of The Town), has recovered from his latest bout with ulcers. Doing a daily column and handling a top-rated TV show is tiring Ed; but he has tremendous drive and the only thing that worries him is having less time for golf! . . . Guy Lombardo, who will do a TV series, broke his own rule for never indulging in politics when he campaigned publicly for Eisenhower.

Dry skin can be joy -or jinx!

by Rosemary Hall
BEAUTY AUTHORITY

Dry skin is both a blessing and a curse. Which it is in your case is up to you. Two women I discussed the problem with just the other day illustrate what I mean!

The first was grateful for her naturally dry complexion, the delicacy it gave her skin and the freedom from that "greasy" look. The second felt terribly about hers. It was drab and flaky, so her make-up looked harsh and little lines were threatening to become wrinkles.

The difference was in the care they gave their complexions. There's no substitute for the regular use of the right care! But, cheer up, it needn't be expensive or time-consuming!

For as little as 25¢—you'll find the best dry skin care money can buy, and one that takes less than 5 minutes a day—Woodbury Dry Skin Cream!

The thing that makes Woodbury remarkable is an ingredient called Penaten which carries the softening oils deep into the corneum layer of your skin. The average cream simply "greases" the surface, but Woodbury really penetrates!

Here's the simple routine that makes the difference:

With your fingertips, cream this extra rich Woodbury Dry Skin Cream into your skin. Leave it on for five minutes, then . . . tissue off.

Your skin will have a new freshness and youthful bloom. Try it and see! Woodbury Dry Skin Cream only costs 25¢ to 97¢ (plus tax).

Ann Blyth replies to a personal question

Dear Betty,

Wanted to answer sooner, but I've been so busy working on my new picture.

Course I've a "beauty secret"—it's Woodbury Cold Cream! The special thing about Woodbury is an ingredient called Penaten that makes it penetrate deeply into pore openings and loosens every bit of make-up. I've tried more expensive creams but never one that left my skin so clean, so fresh and soft as Woodbury Cold Cream... I'm sure you'll love it, too!

Sincerely, Ann Blyth

HOLLYWOOD HEARTBEATS:

The grass is always greener in the next pasture, and ain't it the truth! When the Masquers Club of Hollywood threw a stag party to honor Jane Wyman as its First Lady, with Janie the only gal present, she said: "When I was dancing in the chorus I was always the third girl from the left in the second row. I kept trying to get into the first row but Alice Faye was always in my way!" . . . Their friends have pegged it as a Spring wedding for Pier Angeli and Kirk Douglas, who calls her "Amarella" . . . Ann Blyth tells me it'll be a June jaunt down the middle aisle for herself and Dr. Jim McNulty. 'Twas his brother, none other than singer Dennis Day, who put young Jim through medical school . . . MGM, incidentally, had better put Ann to work in the next Mario Lanza picture pronto because once she's Mrs. McNulty she wants a big family right now!

It's getting real cozy with Joan Crawford and Nick Ray. They each brought their own children when they dated at the preem of The Jazz Singer . . . We got a long-delayed letter (it Clark Gable and Grace Kelly celebrated with her, as did John Ford—and, of course, her ever-lovin' Frankie! She wrote: "We even had a make-believe fireplace, and hung our stockings in front of it" . . . Bob Wagner dyed his hair black, and it's a good foil for Barbara Stanwyck's grey locks . . . Romantic bust-ups of the month: Coleen Gray and John Payne, Nora and Dick Haymes (one of those off-again things that'll probably be on-again before

Dick Jaeckel, the beefcake boy whose career is zooming because of Come Back, Little Sheba, rifted with his wife and two kids. It happens so often when an actor becomes successful in Hollywood, it makes you wonder if success is worth it . . . Lana Turner, Art Linkletter and others of Humphrey Bogart's neighbors are sore at him and his Baby because their two boxers bark all night . . . I hear that those spats between Jennifer Jones and her spouse, David Selznick, are over money—her money! In other words, he wants to tell her how to spend what she earns.

You've never seen so much scurrying back and forth between law offices as Johnnie and Marilyn Ray are doing, in preparation for their separation and/or divorce. But Marilyn keeps telling everyone that if she has her way the settlement will be amicable . . . An airplane is mixed up in the community property wrangle between John and Esperanza Wayne. She claims it's hers and that John won't give it back . . . John Hodiak has been forgetting all about Anne Baxter with a little French model who lives at the Beverly Hills Hotel. John Payne introduced them . . . Paramount threatened to slap a new clause into Jerry Lewis' contract that will prevent the comic from ever again riding a motor scooter. TIME TABLES:

You gals can relax. Bob Wagner isn't marrying till he's 30 . . . Susie Hayward tells me she wants to buy a home in the San Fernando Valley with a tree house in the back yard . . . Jane Russell says Bob Waterfield talks more in five minutes while doing a guest appearance on television than he does in five hours at home . . . When John Farrow gifted his wife, Maureen O'Sullivan, with a mink coat their 13-year-old Michael said, “Daddy, it would have been cheaper to make it out of $20 bills.”

Alexis Smith and Craig Stevens, who broke up housekeeping a year ago, have been going to parties together but it doesn't mean a thing makeup-wise . . . Greer Garson decorated a new apartment in Dallas to surprise her Buddy . . . One of the reasons Red Skelton collapsed was because he wanted to lose weight in a hurry and ate nothing—absolutely nothing—for two-and-a-half days. He lost 12 pounds doing it but we almost lost our Red! . . . When Robert and Vera Newton moved into the Bogarts' old house they found a pair of old shoes that Bogie had left behind. So Bob planted them with ivy and set them proudly out on the front porch.

FUNNIES:

Bob Hope said to Jean Peters on his airshow: “They tell me a woman is a rag, a bone and a hank of hair—so what's all the rest of that stuff you've got there?” . . . Joan Davis went into a reducing salon to try on a girdle designed to make you look thin and, having tried it on, exulted: “Wonderful, wonderful—but why is my face blue?” . . . Bob Mitchum complained that most of the paintings at an art exhibit on the Sunset Strip weren't well lit. “So what?” so-whatted the attendant. “Most of the customers are!” . . . Somebody phoned in a suggestion that 20th-Fox change the title of The Robe to The Disrobe and let Marilyn Monroe star in it . . . I'm told Errol Flynn is the only man in the world who carries a marriage license in his back pocket made out “To Whom It May Concern.”

FINANCIAL PAGE:

Farley Granger and Sam Goldwyn made up again, after Farl's long suspension. And Farl is making trips to the bank again . . . Anne Baxter's ma gets $50 a week as her secretary and her dad gets 20 percent of Anne's pay as business manager . . . Nancy Sinatra refused $150,000 from Mario Lanza for the mansion she and Frankie once lived in, against her attorney's advice. She's holding out for $210,000, plus another $25,000 for the carpets and drapes . . . Mitzi Gaynor and her ma took a two-year lease on a $500-a-month penthouse at the Chateau Marmont.

LONG HUNCH DEP'T:

I've got it from inside the inside rail that the much-vaunted wedding of Beetsy Wynn, Keenan's ex-wife, and Dan Dailey will never take place . . . First word we had in Hollywood of a rift in the marriage of Greg and Greta Peck was when Greta sent word to Rosheen Marcus that Rosheen would have to vacate the Pecks' Pacific Palisades home. They had rented it to Rosheen, who is William Saroyan's mother-in-law, for 18 months before they took off for Europe. But they hadn't been gone nine months when Greta decided to come home. Greg stayed on in Paris, alone, and Mel Ferrer went over to try to patch up the rift . . . There were also reports busting out all over that Gene and Betsy Kelly weren't getting along in Paris.

The Pecks

Hedy Lamarr and Virginia Field will never like each other as much after their last encounter (witnessed by your ever-lovin' correspondent) on Rodeo Drive in Beverly Hills. Hedy, just back from New York, bumped into Virginia and screamed, “Dollink, why is your hair so gray?” Virginia fanged back: “I had it touched up that way for a part in a picture—why's yours that way?” And Hedy, stuck for an answer, turned on her heel and walked away! . . . Clark Gable bagged two white zebras in Africa. He'll cover the seats of his new Jaguar car with the skins . . . Another hot feud: Paulette Goddard and Richard Ney. They haven't spoken since they made a picture together in Spain and nobody's quite sure why!

HOME FIRES BURNING:

Donald O'Connor gave up the lease on his Hayworth Drive apartment in Hollywood and moved back into his home with his Gwen, after a long talk with his psychiatrist . . . First person to get a phone call through to Liz Taylor after Michael Howard Wilding's birth was Jean Simmons. 'Twas only a few hours after Junior arrived but Liz explained: “Well, the phone was sitting there on the hospital table and it rang and I picked it up and answered it. What's so unusual?” What, indeed? . . . Clifton Webb escorted Susie Zanuck to the Inauguration Ball . . . Seventy-one cases of imported champagne were consumed at the wedding of Peggy Lee and Brad Dexter, and Eugenie Clair Smith, the cigarette heiress, never once took off her floor-length white mink . . . Ann Sothern was baptized a Catholic . . . Jane Powell's waistline has bounced up to 22 inches since her baby came.

O'Connor

Burt Lancaster's six-year-old son suffered a concussion when he fell to the floor at home while Burt was tossing him playfully in the air. Doctors said the child will be okay but Burt will never bounce him again!

Coleen Gray's daughter told a schoolmate: “When Mommie marries John Payne, Kathy Payne will be my stepsister” . . . But you wouldn't have agreed with the child if you'd seen Payne (Coleen was in Europe making a picture) rushing Arleen Whelan at Betty Furness's party in the Champagne Room.

Rock Hudson nosed out his old gal, Marilyn Maxwell, for the honorary post of Mayor of Universal City . . . When she's prowling a bargain in a Beverly Hills department store there's no more unmoviestarish a star anywhere than Ruth Roman . . . Rita Hayworth built a wire cage with sliding roof against one side of her house for her kids to play in in safety . . . Glenn Ford's temperament has been showing all over the place lately. He should have a talk with his pal Bill Holden on how to behave like a star . . . Judy Powell, Tab Hunter's latest girl friend, isn't jealous a bit. Loretta Young is living in a dressing room at U-I while It Happens Every Thursday is before the cameras.

Eleanor Parker stopped in at the Four Star Theatre on Wilshire Boulevard to see Bette Davis in The Star and encountered some confusion engendered by the non-appearance of an usherette. So Eleanor took over and seated the startled customers for a jolt less than two hours. Which is some seating, you will admit! . . . Jimmy Stewart will open the Ringling Brothers-Barnum & Bailey Circus here next spring in the same costume he wore as "Buttons" in The Greatest Show On Earth . . . Olivia deHavilland is back living in the same apartment in Mitch Leisen's Shoreham that she vacated when she married Marcus Goodrich . . . This is Sterling Hayden's third year on a psychiatrist's couch . . . The kids in Beverly Hills still order their favorite drink at the drug store counters there—a Shirley Temple Cocktail. It consists of "gingerale on the rocks" with a dash of maraschino cherry juice.

SEX APPEAL:

Jeanne Crain got a poodlecut and I'm not sure I like her that way . . . Betty Grable got a butch haircut . . . Has anyone ever seen a pair of female legs that didn't look good in black net stockings? . . . Mrs. James Mason called to tell me: "Some evil woman came up to me at a party to tell me that Marilyn Monroe and Marie Wilson wear pushups in their bras!" . . . Abdullah, the Warner masseur, says the freckles on Doris Day's shoulders are prettier than the ones on her nose . . . Mrs. Gary Cooper bought her friend Dolores Del Rio some net nylon nighties before taking off for Mexico to visit Dolores . . . Zsa Zsa Gabor tells us she wears long-playing lipstick. Which is something like a long-playing phonograph needle! . . . Diana Lynn swears she'll never wear pink when she does a television show again. On her last show her gown looked like it was cut clear down to the Dagmar Department!

Una Merkel says: "These days an actress either has to have a bust or BE one!" . . . GI's in Korea are writing Jan Sterling for duplicates of her turtle-neck sweater . . . Terry Moore claims she developed her—uh—er—anyway, she did it all through exercise . . . Rosemary Clooney and José Ferrer were so anxious to get away from it all and be alone after the Moulin Rouge preem, they walked out of the Mocambo before the star, Edith Piaf, sang her first song . . . Shelley Winters looked nice, for a change, at the same affair: a smooth makeup job, real gone mink coat, combed hairdo. But when that gal puts her mind to it she's the sloppiest in town . . . Dottie Lamour saluted Adolph Zukor this way at his 80th birthday party: "I've visited you in your office at least 112 times in the past 16 years, Papa Zukor, and you never once came around the desk and tried to—tried to—tell me, Papa Zukor, if I'm so unattractive, why did you ever put me in pictures in the first place?" . . . That Lana Turner still steals ALL the attention wherever she goes. I watched her sweep into LaRue one Sunday night on Lex Barker's arm, whereupon every neck at the bar craned to follow her every footstep into the main dining room. And every diner dropped his dinnerware and gawked and gawked and gawked! Cool, man!

QUICK QUOTES:

Virginia Mayo and Jeff Chandler were runners-up for the Golden Apple Awards from the Hollywood Women's Press Club for being the most cooperative filmites of the year and Virginia said at the awards party: "Stars who don't co-operate with the press must have rocks in their heads!" . . . Tony Curtis (he and his Janet were first prize winners) looked around the room and giggled: "Four years ago I couldn't afford to walk into this restaurant!" . . . Melinda Markey, Joan Bennett's daughter, says she hides her eyes behind dark glasses in the daytime "'cause I use them so much at night!"

When he finished his co-starring stint with Deborah Kerr in Dream Wife Cary Grant said, "There are only two women I ever enjoyed working with—Ina Claire (remember her?) and Deborah Kerr" . . . Shirley Booth said this to tell me about how Terry Moore behaved during the shooting of Little Sheba: "That sweet child worried more about how her torso was being photographed than anything else!" . . . Arlene Francis' advice to Vanessa Brown about endorsing commercial products: "Honey, I would even pose with plumbing!" . . . Someone cracked that Marilyn Monroe wears falsies. Replied Marilyn to the canard: "People who know me better know better!" . . . It's gospel that Tab Hunter spends two hours a day answering his fan mail. He says: "When I was a kid I wrote to Liz Taylor and got back a form letter. I'm not going to do that to other kids!" . . . An accident as a child made aristocrat Toulouse-Lautrec a crippled dwarf. Thirsting for beauty, he found art a consolation.

Love did not come to Lautrec . . . he had to buy it. He took a street-walker into his home. She bled him of money, broke his heart; but was a great model.

He lived at café tables . . . died of absinthe. But his paintings still hang in the Louvre.

MOULIN ROUGE

■ Toulouse-Lautrec was a deformed, lonely man, but when he painted his posters for the Moulin Rouge—a Paris café of the 1880's—he caught all the color, movement and excitement he thirsted after. In the hands of director John Huston, this picture captures those qualities, too. Here is Paris, city of gorgeous women and wild emotions, city of the Can-Can dancer whose loud, gay shouts echo in the streets of Montmartre. And here is Toulouse-Lautrec, a pitiful freak, sitting at a table in the Moulin, soaking himself in liquor, sketching those dancers. José Ferrer portrays Lautrec and, thanks to a bizarre but effective make-up trick, literally gets down on his knees to do it. (Lautrec was injured as a young boy and his legs stopped growing.) Rather than become a pampered invalid on his parents' estate, Lautrec rented a studio in Paris where he played out his life in passion and pain. There was a street-walker (Colette Marchand) who gave him a glimpse of love followed by a whole vista of despair. There was the dazzling café singer (Zsa-Zsa Gabor) whose friendship eased his dreadful loneliness. There was the model (Suzanne Flon) who could not bring herself to marry him. Lautrec's fame grew to the point where he became the only living artist to have a collection in the Louvre. But this had never been his goal. He had wanted love, and died for the lack of it. Moulin Rouge is a memorable visual experience. It drenches you with the brilliance of Paris.—United-Artists

THE STAR

The star (Bette Davis) is through in Hollywood, but you tell her. She thinks she can come back like Swanson—even if she is down to her last three bucks and her agent (Warner Anderson) won't advance another dime. At 40, the lines are beginning to show and kids like Barbara Lawrence are pushing her out of the picture. Nevermind. Bette has a 12-year-old daughter (Natalie Wood) who thinks she's tops, although Natalie lives with the star's ex-husband and can't do much cheering. One night Bette breaks down, drinks herself into jail. Sterling Hayden, who's always had a soft spot for her (Bette made him a lead in a big production, then he switched to the boating business) pays the fine. Maybe you're finished with being glamorous, he tells her, but you haven't even begun to be a woman. She takes this kindly, runs out to the May Company where they put her in lingerie (that is, she sells lingerie) for about ten minutes, or until a couple of catty dowagers recognize her. Finally, Bette's agent talks a nice producer into testing her for a minor role. Bette wants the major role, figures if she plays the test like a teen-ager they'll give it to her. Well, they don't, but that isn't important. The important thing is—will Bette realize that life can be beautiful, even if there'll never be another Oscar? I guess you'd call this a woman's picture. Women cry when they see it.

Cast: Bette Davis, Sterling Hayden, Natalie Wood, Warner Anderson, Minor Watson.—20th Century-Fox.

TAXI

This is a comedy, a very good one. Scratch the surface and you learn something about real people reminiscent of Damon Runyon's characters. Dan Dailey's a New York taxi driver. He lives with his mother (Blanche Yurka) and what with trying to evade the pathetic spinsters she's dying to have him marry, and paying off the Finance Company for his cab he's become a rather pessimistic, touchy guy. Dailey plays him beautifully. One day, the fare he picks up at a Brooklyn pier is a young Irish girl (Constance Smith) aglow with faith. A footloose American married and left her in Dublin and she has 24 hours to find him (Immigration Dep't. rules). Constance doesn't think her husband's unfaithful; she thinks he's wonderful. Probably just too busy writing his novel to claim her and the baby. In the time it takes to locate that man (Mark Roberts) a change comes over Dailey. He loses a whole day's pay and doesn't care; he's gained something much more valuable. 20th Century-Fox makes New York the backdrop for this fast moving script. And the freshness of Constance Smith, the broad humor of Blanche Yurka—are a constant delight.

Cast: Dan Dailey, Constance Smith, Blanche Yurka, Neva Patterson—20th Century-Fox.

THE JAZZ SINGER

The original Jazz Singer made motion picture history. It was the first talkie and a personal triumph for Al Jolson whose classic comment at that time was, "You ain't heard nothin' yet!" Warner Brothers has dusted off the plot, spruced it up with Technicolor and trot it out now as a very handsome offering. This is the conflict of two worlds, of father and son who clash over the son's right to order his own life. Danny Thomas is given a lot of room to display his varied wares and he emerges as a genuinely warm personality. Eduard Franz (as Danny's father) plays a benevolent but stern elder who lives in the shadows of tradition. He is a cantor—as were six generations of Goldings before him—and he expects Danny to follow suit. Danny can't think of anything but show business. We move back and forth from the interior of Sinai Temple and its pure, Hebraic songs of prayer to the jazzy stages of New York (where Peggy Lee does her own kind of stylized chanting) as the conflict grows and resolves itself. Alex Gerry and Allyn Joslyn provide comic relief. Mildred Dunnock (Danny's mother) is a sweet, understanding soul. However, her talent is much superior to the part. The story deals with old-fashioned sentiments, but it is full of heart and the bright performances of Danny and Peggy keep it moving right along.

Cast: Danny Thomas, Peggy Lee, Mildred Dunnock, Eduard Franz, Tom Tully, Alex Gerry, Allyn Joslyn—Warners.

LISTERINE STOPS BAD BREATH

4 times better than chlorophyll

DON'T let *halitosis (bad breath) put you in a bad light. And don't trust lesser methods to combat it.

Listerine Antiseptic instantly stops bad breath . . . usually for hours on end. Your entire mouth feels—and is—delightfully fresh and clean.

Kills odor-producing germs

You see, by far the most common cause of halitosis is germs. That's right, germs start the odor-producing fermentation of proteins which are always present in your mouth.

Listerine kills germs that cause this fermentation . . . kills them by the millions. Brushing your teeth doesn't give you this antiseptic protection. Chlorophyll or chewing gums don't kill germs. Listerine does.

4 times better than tooth paste

That's why Listerine Antiseptic stops halitosis instantly . . . and usually for hours! And that's why Listerine Antiseptic averaged four times better in stopping bad breath than three leading chlorophyll products and two leading tooth pastes it was tested against.

So, if you want really effective protection against halitosis . . . no matter what else you do . . . use an antiseptic—Listerine Antiseptic, the most widely used antiseptic in the world. Lambert Pharmacal Company Division of The Lambert Company, St. Louis, Missouri.

played by David Wayne, was born in the Ukraine, matured in a hardware store in St. Petersburg where he met his wife Emma (Anne Bancroft). He came to New York alone at the turn of the century, got a job as a streetcar conductor and dreamed like a prince. How he made those dreams come true, how the greatest artists in the world came under his management, is a heartwarming tale. In the telling, 20th Century-Fox employs some rare talents. Ballet by Tamara Toumanova, operatic arias by Roberta Peters and the voice of Jan Peerce (the body belongs to handsome Byron Palmer), violin music by Isaac Stern add quality and depth to an essentially simple story. For once, Ezio Pinza has a movie role equal to his dignity. As Fedor Chaliapin, temperamental master of grand opera, he is magnetic and charming. This Technicolor production is a fine tribute to Hurok and a special treat for classical music lovers.

Cast: David Wayne, Ezio Pinza, Roberta Peters, Tamara Toumanova, Anne Bancroft, Isaac Stern, Byron Palmer, Oscar Karlweis, Mikhail Rasumny.—20th Century-Fox.

ROGUE'S MARCH

When a British officer and gentleman is nabbed with the goods (secret military documents) it doesn't matter who his pater is. Doesn't even matter if he's innocent, unless he can prove it, which Peter Lawford (the British O and G) can't. So the Royal Midland Fusiliers drum him out of the service (that's the Rogue's March) and he's handed over to the bobbies. But Peter gives them the slip to hunt down the bloke who framed him. Too bad that bloke (John Abbott) has been dumped into the Channel, or some body of water, by his gangster pals. Undaunted, Peter assumes an alias, joins another part of the British army. He's sent to India where his father (Leo G. Carroll) commands a battalion that's going to be awfully lost unless some heroic action takes place at the Khyber Pass. MGM went straight to the Pass to show Peter performing the action and turning up the one man who could prove his innocence. Well, Pater apologizes for ever having doubted his son, and with Peter back Janice Rule doesn't have to marry Captain Richard Greene, although there are worse fates. It's a very pip-pip and carry-on sort of thing, if you like that sort of thing.

Cast: Peter Lawford, Richard Greene, Janice Rule, Leo G. Carroll, John Abbott.—MGM.

CITY BENEATH THE SEA

A couple of deep sea divers (Robert Ryan and Anthony Quinn) swagger into Jamaica one bright morning for the job of their lives. They're hired to recover a million dollars worth of gold bullion that sunk with a ship in the Caribbean. You can bet the deal is shady. Whenever their diving suits are drying, though, the boys hunt other kinds of treasure. Tony tears a café apart by way of getting an introduction to the singer (Suzan Ball), and Bob, who's sent by the outdoor type, gets sent forever by Mala Powers. When not being romantic, Mala is operating a small banana boat. That boat takes Ryan out to the sunken city of Port Royal where the camera moves in for some spooky underwater shots. As soon as the local natives hear that divers are poking around in their sacred city they stage a voodoo ceremony, predict disaster. It comes, too. While Bob Ryan is underwater there's an underwater earthquake. If you like action, here's plenty, and Tony Quinn's okay, too, as an unpolished Romeo.

Cast: Robert Ryan, Mala Powers, Anthony Quinn, Suzan Ball.—U.I.

THE STARS ARE SINGING

a Polish freighter and swims up the East River into harbor. The Polish government (which liquidated her parents) doesn't take this lightly. Neither does the American government. But Rosemary takes it as a sign that her luck will change. She's been struggling along with dogfood commercials; now she spots a goldmine in Anna's coloratura. Only thing is she has to keep Anna in the country to cash in. With the help of several friends—an unemployed hooper, Tom Morton; just unemployed Bob Williams (he has an hilarious dog act); and Lauritz Melchior, a one-time opera great who is giving his all to alcohol—Rosemary hides Anna from the authorities. Oh, yes, Rosemary's boyfriend, a lawyer named John Archer, flies to Washington to plead their case. It's all very confused and funny, but nothing interferes with the singing that goes on almost constantly. THE NAKED SPUR

When the Indians in this Technicolor Western get shot, their horses roll right over them. And the white men—they're so ornery you're ashamed to belong to the human race. It's a brutal affair, centering around a bitter fellow (James Stewart) who came back from the Civil War to find his sweetheart married and the farm he deeded to her sold. Now he wants money to buy back the land. It happens that a killer (Robert Ryan) has $5,000 on his head, which will just about cover Stewart's losses, so he sets out to find him. Ryan's hiding in the Rockies with Janet Leigh who treats him more or less like a father. Stewart and a couple of fellows he's run into (Millard Mitchell, Ralph Meeker) overpower Ryan and the trip back to Kansas City, where the reward waits, begins. On that trip all the greed, cynicism and hatred of hopeless men come out. Ryan, fighting for his life, deliberately sets the trio against each other. "Five thousand dollars splits better two ways," he says, grinning. He knows who he's talking to. Meeker's the type who'd shoot his own grandmother, and Mitchell's one of those worn out gold prospectors who might have been different if he hadn't spent himself in the wide open spaces. Anyway, Janet Leigh plays a sort of roughneck ingenue and winds up with Jimmy Stewart, which is something—but not much, considering that every other male is freshly dead.

FROM THE MOVIES

APRIL IN PARIS—album of selections by Doris Day* (Columbia)
Dodo does a delightful job with some of the songs from this gay musical. Outstanding sides, we thought, were That's What Makes Paris Parce, with Paul Weston's orchestra and the Norman Luboff choir helping out; and I Know A Place.

THE ASTAIRE STORY—Four LPs by Fred Astaire (Mercury)

This Norman Gronz production is a unique venture. If you happen to have a rich relative, it's available in a de luxe edition with wonderful candid photographs and sketches of Fred making the album. For ordinary mortals, the music is available separately and you can buy one or more of these four LP discs; together they bring you 34 of the great songs with which he's been identified, as well as three dance numbers on which he taps very informally. Most of Astaire's movies (Top Hat, Roberta, Swing Time, Blue Skies and others) are represented by songs in this collection. After looking over the list you realize he's been mixed up with more hit songs than anybody, even Bing Crosby. Lady Be Good, Night & Day, Dancing In The Dark, The Carioca, The Way You Look Tonight are all here.

What makes the whole thing doubly successful is that he's accompanied, not by an elaborate and pretentious studio orchestra, but by six stars from Gronz' concert outfit: Charlie Shavers, trumpet; Flip Phillips, tenor sax; Oscar Peterson, the wonderful Canadian pianist; Barney Kessel, guitar; Alvin Stoller, drums; and Roy Brown, bass. This intimate, soft setting is perfect for Fred's voice, which has more charm than actual quality or quantity. At the end of the last side, Fred turns them all loose for a top-notch jam session.

EVERYTHING I HAVE IS YOURS and LILI—album from sound tracks* (MGM)

Here's an unusual package, combining music from two recent MGM Technicolor productions. Everything I Have Is Yours, the lovely title song, is well sung by Monica Lewis, who also does the 17,000 Telephone Poles novelty. Marge and Gower Champion are represented with Like Monday Follows Sunday and Derry Down Dilly. Johnny Green conducts the studio orchestra in the attractive Serenade For A New Baby. Except for Hi-Lili Hi-Lo (done by Leslie Caron and Mel Ferrer) the selections from Lili are instrumental, featuring the unusual music Bronislaw Kaper wrote for the ballet sequences.

"now we have everything"

"Let's make it a boy,"

Lucy said, when they wrote a baby into the script. And, to the delight of 35 million viewers, and two relieved parents, a boy it was!

BY ARTHUR L. CHARLES

This is how Lucy and Desi looked on TV the big night. Made up for a voodoo number, Desi begged Lucy to have the baby before he left for his night club date.

■ Returning from the doctor's office one memorable April afternoon, Lucille Ball ran into Desi Arnaz on the sound stage at General Service Studios where they shoot the I Love Lucy series. She took him aside and said, "Honey, you're going to be a father again. What'll we do?"

"What'll we do?" Desi repeated. "What'll we do about what?" He took the redhead in his arms and smothered her makeup with a wild assortment of kisses.

"What'll we do about the show?" Lucille persisted. "You can't hide a pregnancy very much after the fifth or sixth month."

"Who wants to hide anything?" Desi shouted. "I think we should tell everyone. This time I'm sure it's going to be a boy."

Excitable Latin that Desi is, it took Lucille a good hour to calm her husband. At home that night there was a sensible discussion. Lucille finally decided that, "I would work on the show as long as I possibly could. I've got a restless nature and just sitting around home waiting for this baby to come would have driven me nuts. Besides everyone knew I was pregnant—with Desi it's impossible to keep a thing like that quiet—so we decided since the show is based on a lot of our home-life incidents, to do a series of films dealing with the preparatory problems of parenthood."

As most TV fans realize, the I Love Lucy program is filmed six weeks before it's actually shown on a television set. It takes that long for the film to be developed, edited, and the commercials inserted. Six weeks before Lucille gave birth to her second baby, it wasn't possible to determine the sex of the child.

The film scheduled to be shown on January 19th, however, boldly declared that Lucy and Desi would have a son. By actually giving birth to a baby boy on the morning of the 19th, Lucille won the gamble on the child's sex.

Lucille was told rather early by her physician that the second child would be delivered via (Continued on page 84)

A. False.

—B. Y., QUINCY, ILL.

—H. G., WONDERLAND, N. J.

A. Some do; generally, however, they don't sell too well.

Q. Does John Wayne have another wife picked out for himself? How old is he anyway?
—A. K., SHAKER HEIGHTS, OHIO

A. Wayne is 45; has no third wife picked out.

Q. How old is James Cagney, also Tallulah Bankhead, Humphrey Bogart, and Walter Pidgeon?
—J. W., CINCINNATI, OHIO

A. Cagney 48; Bankhead 50; Bogart 53; Pidgeon 55.

Q. Why is Bob Hope so terrible on television and so good in movies? Doesn't he use the same writers for both media?
S. W., EASTHAMPTON, MASS.

A. Hope has yet to accustom himself to TV. Paramount employs separate screenplay writers. Hope employs TV writers.

Q. Is it true that Dean Martin hero-worships Bing Crosby?
—F. F., ERIE, PA.

A. Yes.

FIRST-BORN!

■ One secret shared only by Elizabeth Taylor, her beloved husband Mike, and her doctor was that she yearned to experience a completely normal birth for her baby. Not that she had criticism for her friends and hundreds of other women who daily give birth by appointment, so to speak, through means of the operation known as Caesarean section. Elizabeth only hoped for the deep emotional fulfillment that only could come with normal childbirth. It was unhappy news that her physician thought it best not to attempt it.

Aside from that, the last few days of her pregnancy were spent in the delightful anticipation of the time when she would attempt to regain her slim figure. Like many another first-time mother, she was so impatient that on the last week before the blessed event she had Mike drive her to Beverly Hills where she spent hours at Amelia Grey's shop, inspecting dresses for a new spring wardrobe.

■ When John Wayne was a small boy—somewhere around ten—he was in love with a woman of about nine. She wasn't, by some standards, much to look at. She was pretty short. Her hair was never combed. A front tooth was missing. She had freckles. But John loved her. He loved her so much that he never had the nerve to tell her. As a matter of fact, he never even spoke to her. He'd just stand half a block away when school let out and fill his eyes with her, and feel his heart swell and his breath come short in his throat.

One day she went away. She just disappeared. Her desk at school was empty, and all the furniture was moved from her house. And John never saw her again. Well, that was a desolate day. And that night at the supper table, John didn't eat a bite. He just sat silently shoving food about on his plate, afraid to speak for fear he'd cry.

After supper young John went for a long walk, down to the house of an old friend who spent his evenings sitting on his porch observing the world and, when it was asked for, dispensing wisdom to those who wished to unburden themselves to him. (Continued on page 107)

ON THE MOVE

Love can be a joy forever. Or a dirty shame. Love is hardly never ever the same. So Beware! says this distinguished Hollywood reporter who writes about that strange thing that makes the world go round.

by LOUELLA PARSONS

■ I've often thought that the Hollywood Highway of Love would not be strewn with half the wreckage it is if only the lovers would give as much attention to the danger signs along the way that they do to the traffic lights at the corner.

In too many cases in our town, lovers are not only blind, they won't even put on 'specs to glance sideways at the most obvious road marks:

LOVERS, BEWARE.

REDUCE SPEED. REBOUND ROAD ROCKY.

Amateurs shouldn't tangle with experts. How can 19-year-old Pier Angeli cope with love problems involving man-of-the-world Kirk Douglas?

Shying away from love is almost as disastrous as dashing into it. Robert Taylor's courtship Ursula Thiess is going too slowly. Is he afraid?

DETOUR. THIS ROAD IS CLOSED FOR REPAIRS.

DANGEROUS CURVES AHEAD—SOMEBODY ELSE'S!

WOLVES AT WORK!

SLOW. DANGER. SLIDE AREA AROUND MATRIMONY.

The result of ignoring the signs too often are complete wreckage, broken hearts and crashes that might have been avoided with just average attention to the Stop, Look and Listen posts.

Sitting on the side of the roadway, sometimes as Love's traffic cop, sometimes as its ambulance chaser and (unfortunately) but frequently its undertaker, I would cite one of the biggest pitfalls as LOVE ON THE REBOUND.

As of this moment, Hollywood is breathlessly watching the spectacle of not one or two lovers on the rebound, but four.

I mean Lana Turner and Lex Barker and Arlene Dahl and Fernando Lamas.

Less than six months ago Lana was in Reno divorcing Bob Topping so she could marry Lamas. And Arlene Dahl had just reconciled with her husband, Lex Barker.

Now it's love, love, love in a violently swift switch of drivers (I mean, partners) with Lana teamed with Lex, and Arlene with Lamas.

When I see a girl of whom I am as sincerely fond as I am of Lana Turner speeding toward the all-time title holder of Queen of Love On The Rebound I feel like saying, "Lana, Lana, how many times do you have to crack-up on the rebound to know that this is not the road to real love?"

Jane Powell's idyllic marriage to Geary Steffens proves that Hollywood love doesn't always land in the ditch. You just have to obey all the rules.

But, warns Louella Parsons, one can take too much time about getting married. Is Marilyn Monroe dilly-dallying too long before marrying her Joe?

When two love as unselfishly as Virginia Mayo and Mike O'Shea, marriage lasts, even with career differences in their paths.

Debbie Paget keeps turning down dates with men who are eager to court her. Take care, Debbie. They may not want to wait till you're ready.

Only time will tell whether or not Joan Evans' hasty, surprise marriage to Kirk Weatherby, completely against her parents' wishes, will be successful.

Wrecked marriages can be repaired. But will Diana Lynn and John Lindsay be mature enough to mend their marriage?

Doris and Marty's two-year-old marriage is a whopping big success . . . but how come? The experts say they're doing everything all wrong!

BY ALICE HOFFMAN

They broke all the rules

■ Song and story, from time immemorial, have persisted that "All the world loves a lover." The sight of a boy and girl strolling together hand in hand draws a smile of approval from almost everyone who sees them. People flip into uncontrollable joy when an engagement is announced and, even if the couple are strangers, most folks shake them by the hand and offer the heartiest of congratulations. At weddings the guests laugh and cry without shame. Love is the greatest thing in the world. Until the couple gets married.

A fellow is a "lucky boy" until he gets the girl—then he is "hooked." The little woman is referred to as "the ball and chain." The poor dope is pictured in cartoons as a mouse, terrified of the lovely creature he married and a legitimate object of pity. His wife's sweet little mother, the doll who used to make him fudge and cook special things for him when he was invited to dinner, after the ceremony becomes a "mother-in-law," a slander that requires no further elaboration.

It would seem pretty safe, then, to say that marriage is not nearly as popular an institution as love—and that a couple who have stuck it out for a couple of years deserve some sort of recognition, if not a medal.

Now that the second wedding anniversary of Doris Day and Marty Melcher is coming 'round the bend, it might be a good time to take stock of this pair and see if marriage has harmed them in any way . . . if it has improved them . . . or (Continued on page 77)

LOVE IN A PENTHOUSE

■ The first time Jerry and Patti Lewis knocked on the door of the new penthouse rented by Janet Leigh and Tony Curtis, they got no answer. Quickly Jerry turned the door knob, and the Lewises rushed in.

As inhibited as a two-weeks-old puppy, Jerry went into his act. He put his fists to his eyes and simulated a pair of binoculars. He sighted across the 40-foot living room. No Janet or Tony. He raced onto the sundeck and swept Wilshire Boulevard with his mock field glasses. No Janet or Tony.

"Maybe they're out playing golf?" Patti suggested.

"Impossible," said detective Lewis. "I checked the garage on the way up. Both of their cars are inside."

Then suddenly and weirdly, from the far reaches of (Continued on page 82)

The Curtis penthouse, one of Hollywood's newest showplaces, boasts a fabulous living room, 30 feet wide, 40 feet long. Although Tony and Janet pay $400 a month, they both agree it's easily worth the rental.

The master bedroom is so large Tony and Janet's king-size double bed looks like an ordinary size one, but it's actually nine-feet long! Both Curtis have their own private dressing rooms, right off the bedroom.

When the Curtises moved in, they dubbed one half of this room "Janet's Den." Behind the storage-wall partition is "Tony's Hobby Shop." The Den has a spinet piano and a tape recarder.

Tony's Hobby Shop, on the other side of the partition, is put to use almost every night, when Tony relaxes with his oil painting, his ship models, his clay masks, or any other creative hobbies. MS Awards hang in here, too.

Instead of having one long custom-built sofa for the living room, Janet chose sectional pieces, which she arranges in conversational groups for parties. Both paintings are signed: T. Curtis.

Romantic hanging drapes separate the tiny dining room (the only small-scale thing in the whole apartment) from the living room. When Janet's in a particularly sentimental mood, she serves dinner by candlelight.

"They say we're unhappy," laugh the Curtises. "If this is misery, let's suffer!"

to riding, and to all the other things he really wants to do.

His horses have won almost a barrel-full of blue ribbons! Dan's newest steed, a big gray, is called Early Autumn.

Deep in a big chair, a tall tousled-looking man sprawled comfortably. He reached for a book lying on the coffee table and read for a few minutes, then he put the book down and gazed out the window at the Pacific Ocean. It seemed to lie there heavily and quietly in the clear air of the crisp November day, and turned red, then purple and then gray as the sun took its downward path. The man looked at it for a long time, and there was something in the peaceful orderliness of the scene that sent a warmth through his whole being. Then suddenly he slapped his leg and smiled a wide smile, and although there was no one else in the room he spoke out loud. "Daniel, this is the easiest you've ever lived!"

Dan Dailey still remembers this brief moment in his life even though it happened months ago, because it was at that point he realized consciously for the first time the achievement he had made. He had reached that elusive goal of human beings—peace of mind.

He told me this over luncheon in the 20th Century-Fox commissary. It was the first time I had met Dan, and about him I had known only that within the past two years he had been divorced, and he had spent a few months at the Menninger Clinic. Rumor had it that Dan was still groping for whatever it was he wanted from life, and that despite treatment at the clinic he was still confused. Yet that day I found him to be a sensitive, intelligent and articulate man, and in the hour we talked he put across to me a great many things, things that were deeply personal to him and difficult to explain.

He told me first about that moment in which he had suddenly realized that he had what he wanted. "Maybe I'd reached that point long before," he said, "but in the last year I've made five pictures and there wasn't much time to sit down and think about myself. Before that, as far as I'm concerned, I was floundering through life and grasping at straws."

Many people go through life grasping at straws and never know it, but Dan's trouble was his awareness of the fact that he wasn't happy, that he didn't know why, and that he did not know how to become happy. And his saving grace was the fact he had the wisdom to realize he was sufficiently mixed up to need medical attention. He (Continued on page 68)

SEX WITH A FRESH-SCRUBBED LOOK, THAT'S TERRY MOORE. DRESS HER IN A PLUNGING NECKLINE

HOLLYWOOD'S NEWEST SEX QUEEN

A tomboy at heart, Terry has the curiosity of a kitten, the spunk of a terrier. She's had some pretty close scrapes because of this combination.

"You sure put the 'she' in Sheba," a fan wrote to Terry after her smash-hit performance in Come Back, Little Sheba. Terry's love scenes with Richard Joeckel rate as the year's hottest.

Divorced from Glenn Davis (after a whirlwind courtship, two months of marriage) Terry's plying the field now. Her date-book's crammed with some of movieland's most eligible men.

■ One day, around a dozen years ago, a joker named Victor Mature teased a pert 11-year-old miss named Helen Koford, who played his kid sister in a picture called My Gal Sal.

He handed her a nickel. "Here, Honey," said Vic. "Save this—and when you're 18, give me a ring."

When she was exactly 18, Helen played in another picture with her erstwhile tormentor, and by then she had another name for herself, Terry Moore. This time she handed Vic back his five-cent piece. "Here's your nickel," she told him. "I won't be needing it. By now gentlemen call me!"

If frisky Vic were footloose and fancy free today and dropped in the well worn coin to call Terry Moore (he'd need to double the ante, of course, with inflation and all) it would be probably just a waste of good money and time. The line's pretty busy. What's more, even if he connected, he'd find the competition mighty rough. Because, both privately and professionally, Terry's suddenly become just about the most popular girl in Hollywood.

Last Christmas holidays, for example, Terry buzzed around to a grand total of 22 parties—taking in five events on Christmas night alone. For two weeks her front room looked like a florist's shop with bowers of red and yellow roses from which dangled cards reading, "Greg Bautzer,"

"Kirk Douglas," "Craig Hill," "Lawrence Harvey"—but why start a list? No girl gets around Hollywood today like Terry does.

There's nothing very surprising about this. In person, Terry Moore's as cute as Christmas itself, with a dainty Venus-type body and a face fresh as a milkmaid's, which not too long ago made her the favorite cover girl of the nation and earned her the titles of "All-American Girl" and "Miss Complexion." She wears clothes like a model, which she once was; owns the pep and energy of a cheer leader, which she also was; flies a plane like a young Jackie Cochran; rides a horse like a Comanche; dances like a feather in the breeze; and talks a blue streak—but very enchantingly indeed. At 23, she's also a gay divorcée (married two brief months to a grid great, Glenn Davis)—all in all, quite an interesting girl.

But around the studios, Terry Moore currently is even more of a sensation. And this fact is much more curious—even amazing to the critics, prophets and sages of Hollywood. Because, until a few weeks ago, her rather juvenile sounding tag raised no show business blood pressure whatever. On the contrary, "Terry Moore" to most casting chiefs signified an unexciting kid-next-door type who rattled around now and then in B-pictures. She'd stirred a mild ripple back yonder with a (Continued on page 88)

■ Or, as they would say it here in Merrie Olde, the group is entirely present. That means us, the Ladds, and includes Alan and Laddie, Carol Lee and Lonnie, and David and myself. We are living in a perfectly lovely house out in the country, about 30 miles from London. Columbia Studio's production office picked it out for us before our arrival here, and they couldn't have chosen a more charming place. It's big and cheerful and comfortable, and includes a fireplace in every bedroom and a flock of bathrooms. It's in Surrey, and if you've ever been in Surrey you'll know what I mean when I say the scenery surrounding us is unbelievably beautiful. Our back door is a few yards away from the eighteenth hole of the Wentworth Golf Course, but instead of making Alan happy, it is a completely frustrating circumstance for him.

Ever since we arrived he has been working day and/or night, with time left over only for sleep, with the result that every time he looks out of a window and sees that tempting expanse of green stretching away in the distance, he just sighs and shrugs his shoulders and looks at me like a whipped dog. "If only I had an hour . . ." he says.

The rest of us feel like pampered darlings, for while our breadwinner has been working we've had the time of our lives. We all love England, love it for a multitude of reasons . . . its picturesque scenery, its ancient buildings and castles, its proud history, and perhaps most of all, its delightful people.

We've felt that way ever since the moment we stepped on English soil, despite the fact we made our landing at Plymouth in the wee hours of the morning. The boat trip on the Ile de France, incidentally, continued as wonderful as it was when I last wrote. The sea was smooth as glass all the way across, a happy fact for me, as it was the first crossing I ever made without turning green with the inevitable results. The food was wonderful—so wonderful, in fact, that Alan got up early one morning to have breakfast, a meal which he usually ignores completely. He came back to our cabin about a half hour later, looking a little sheepish.

"That was quick," I said. "I thought you were going to run the gamut of the whole menu."

"I haven't eaten yet," he said.

"What do you mean?"

He set his jaw slightly. "How do you say 'ham and eggs' in French? I've been trying for a half hour to make the waiter understand. Susie, you'll just have to go back with me."

Laddie is the only one of the children who isn't familiar with the rudiments of the French language, and he was quite confused by the (Continued on page 70)

EDITOR'S NOTE: HOLLYWOOD STARS ARE FREQUENTLY SHOCKED WHEN THEY ARRIVE IN GREAT BRITAIN FOR THE FIRST TIME—ONLY TO BE GREETED BY COOLNESS VERGING ON DOWNRIGHT HOSTILITY. IT'S HAPPENED TO MANY. IT HAPPENED TO THE LADDS. HERE'S A BRITISH ACCOUNT OF WHAT WAS BEHIND IT AND THE REASON WHY.

■ The handsome Ladd family stood close-pressed against the deck rail of the Ile de France which was bringing them into port at Plymouth one gray dawn in the early fall. Mrs. Ladd had a tight hold on little David; Carol Lee and Lannie were shining with excitement as 15-year-old Laddie instructed them on the art of docking an ocean liner; and Alan Ladd was taut with expectancy.

The six of them were ready, waiting and smiling when Columbia Studio's head publicity man in England burst into their quarters. Naturally they expected a friendly and warm welcome on such an occasion, but he told them bluntly that they were about to receive no such thing.

"In fact," he declared pulling no punches, "those waiting for you outside with cameras would just as soon you stayed aboard and sailed right back with the ship."

Alan Ladd's smile faded as he listened. Sue Carol took his hand and squeezed it. The children pressed close to them. The Ladds, the nicest people in Hollywood, had never had anything like that said to them before, and it hurt. All the head of the family would say was a tight, "Thanks for the information," as he walked outside to face the barrage.

He didn't know what had happened. Or why. He hadn't had a chance to read the bitter copy in the English press which had been printed day after day since the (Continued on page 70)

the Mouse takes the Lion

By RICHARD DEXTER

She's not timid. And she's sure not

■ The interview was almost over. We had been sitting for a couple of hours talking to Debbie Reynolds, getting up to date on everything in her life—work, romance and—the most important thing on her mind at the moment—her trip to Korea to entertain the troops. We had folded our notebook and put our pencil away.

"Oh, just one more thing," she said. "I'm not sure I like this movie business. I may not go on with it, you know."

"You're kidding," we said.

Debbie laughed. "No, not kidding," she said. "But don't worry. I'm not quitting."

IN A MOVIE DREAM SEQUENCE DEBBIE GOT GLAMOR. BUT SHE'S ANYBODY'S DREAM GIRL WIDE AWAKE.

Poodles and mink was a script writer's idea for Debbie's dream of Hollywood success in I Love Melvin. Our heroine took to them quite as successfully as she does to her blue-jeans and bandanna.

Fine feathers make a fine bird. And that's some chicken! But ask Debbie what she's doing in pictures, and you'll get the idea it's just a lark. MGM sees it as large golden eagles in box office returns.

right now. Its just that it's not everything in life to me. And my parents think I'm crazy to get up so early every morning and work so hard. They don't care if I'm a movie star or not."

"But you can be rich and famous," we protested.

"There are other things," said Debbie. She excused herself and left.

Well, we wrote that down and shuffled away to think it over. Trying to take stardom away from a movie star is about as hard as trying to snatch a roast bone away from a Great Dane that has been kept foodless in the cellar for a week. A star suggesting that she might give it up voluntarily was incongruous. And then the final dialogue began to fit into the rest of the conversation and began to make sense. Debbie Reynolds was a movie star for only one reason. It pleased her to be at the moment. And everything she had told us before seemed to agree with that. It wasn't the fame or the money. It was the fun and the chance to do good that kept her happy. If it got dull and thankless by her standards, she might very well quit. We don't think she will, but she's thought of it before though she hasn't said much.

We went through the notes again and we figured out that the trip to Korea had started her thinking this way again. The newspapers had been filled for days with stories of the hardships that had been encountered by the plane-load of stars who had been along on the jaunt. And there was none of that in Debbie's account. It was a lark, sad in some ways, but a joy to her. And then we decided that the best way maybe to bring everybody up to date on Debbie Reynolds was to tell about that trip. What she (Continued on page 100) honesty against heart-that to admit defeat was better than

BY JACK WADE

Courageous heart

■ Late one Wednesday afternoon last December, right after she had finished The Blue Gardenia, Anne Baxter joined her husband, John Hodiak, before the fireplace of their attractively appointed living room to work out details of a grave but, to them both, a necessary decision.

While John lighted the fire, Anne touched a match to the row of candles on the modern Hawaiian-Chinese coffee table. The servants had been dismissed, and their 18-month-old daughter, Katrina, put to bed with a special tenderness. In their home, where they had lived as man and wife for six years, all was calm, but all was not bright—as Christmas carolers would have assured them at that moment had they switched on the radio across the room. Their mutual mood was one of empty defeat. They had decided they could not stand living together any longer and were talking over plans for their separation and divorce.

By the time the candles had guttered down to shapeless stumps, everything had been arranged and agreed to, sensibly, quietly and without emotional display, even to the day and date of John's departure—six o'clock, the next Sunday. Then they both signed a statement to be released—which it was—the minute John carried his bags away from the familiar front stoop that Sunday evening, four days before Christmas, promptly at six. It read:

"Our decision to separate after six years is a painful one. We have tried very hard to avoid the finality of the word—divorce.

"Above everything, we wanted our marriage to be a success. We denied the many rumors in past months both to our friends and to the press, because we felt sincerely that keeping our differences to ourselves gave us a greater opportunity to work them out. We feel they will understand.

"We have no other interests and no career problems. We feel heartsick and defeated that in spite of all our hopes and efforts at understanding, basic incompatibilities have made our life together impossible."

Now, only too often in Hollywood and elsewhere, such "statements" are meaningless, a mumbo-jumbo of double-talk, designed to gloss over more unpalatable and unpleasant facts. "Incompatibility" usually covers a multitude of matrimonial sins. But in this respect, Anne and John Hodiak's announcement—meticulously rewritten 26 times—was unique. It was the truth, and pretty much the whole truth.

There is not, and never has been, any other man or woman in Anne's or John's life.

There are no career flounderings on either side. On the contrary, professionally both Anne and John have just enjoyed one of their best years.

Anne Baxter's current sexy glamor campaign did not infuriate her husband. That has been strictly a professional maneuver to widen her acting range, and recognized as such by John. Actually, he first suggested that she blondine her hair and make herself more glamorous. But neither has ever controlled, influenced or criticized the other's screen life.

There have been no violent clashes of temper or temperament, no physical battles. No stormy walkouts, runouts, or "matrimonial holidays." There have been no arguments about money, or (Continued on page 95)

■ When executives of 20th Century-Fox told Jeff Hunter he was to leave for England and make a movie there last summer, he stood looking at them in disbelief.

"But—" he said.

"Our British company is making the picture," they said. "You're to leave about the middle of August."

"But—" said Jeff.

"It's called Sailor Of The King, and it will be shot both in England and Malta."

"But—"

"You'd better apply for your passport right away."

When he went home and told Barbara about it she managed to finish the sentence

Four months away from home is a long time, especially if it's the first four months of your son's life! Barbara spent hours bringing Jeff up to date for him. "But what about the baby?"

Jeff gave a half-hearted shrug. What could he do about it? All his life he had wanted to see faraway places; during the war he had volunteered for the Navy in the hope he might be shipped out to the South Pacific, but he'd ended up with measles and attendant complications, and that was the end of his dream about joining the Navy and seeing the world. Now he'd been given his chance, given it on a silver platter with traveling expenses gratis, and to boot a good picture that was to be directed by one of England's finest, Roy Boulting, (Seven Days To Noon). Here it was, and he was to leave a full two weeks before his first child was scheduled to be born.

Jeff was a completely normal expectant father in thinking his presence was necessary at the time Barbara gave birth. The doctor had said it might have to be a Caesarean operation, and Jeff was worried. Barbara was a normal expectant mother in wanting her husband to be with her when the great event happened. But there was only one answer. Jeff might be a Hollywood actor, but he is like every other working man—he must follow his boss's orders.

Gloomily, he packed a pile of suitcases, stashed them in fence fashion around the walls of the living room, and waited. From (Continued on page 105)

With Barbara helping, Jeff got packed in a jiffy . . . then spent days just sitting, surrounded by suitcases, waiting orders to sail!

But . . . but . . . he's grown so big!" exclaims Jeff, when he's re-introduced to san Chris.

Presents from France and England flooded Barbara and the baby. Home again, Jeff hears Barbara admire the gifts he sent.

Jeff's busy making up for the first four months of fatherhood. Barbara takes a well-deserved rest while Pap heats a bottle.

STAR BOARD VOTES SPRING STYLE AWARDS

■ It's Spring again . . . and again time for one of the most outstanding events of the fashion year: MODERN SCREEN's Annual Fashion Party in Hollywood! More than 150 top screen personalities gathered recently at a fabulous, star-studded fashion showing, to view the styles you'll want to be wearing this Spring and Summer.

This year's showing took place on the magnificent estate of Pamela and James Mason. The Masons not only put out the welcome mat for their glamorous guests, but acted as host and hostess along with the editors of MODERN SCREEN.

By 12:30 on the gala afternoon, the Mason mansion was a-buzz with the excited arrivals of one big-name star after another. Fernando Lamas, who came without a date, was immediately surrounded by a bevy of beautiful girls. Lita

Baron and her husband Rory Calhoun were both full of talk about their night club act and their trip to Korea, as they greeted their hostess. Virginia Mayo and Ursula Thiess, one blonde and beautiful, the other brunette and ditto, were among the early arrivals, as were Anne Francis, Robert Ryan, June Haver, Jan Sterling, Michael O'Shea, Mona Freeman, Anne Baxter, Maureen O'Hara and Piper Laurie.

As the guests arrived, either Pamela or James conducted them through the house (the former residence, incidentally, of Buster Keaton) to the garden terrace, where a buffet luncheon was being served. Handsomely uniformed waiters in bright red coats dashed back and forth, offering punch and hors d'oeuvres, to the guests. Hot curried chicken and cold sliced turkey headed the menu. What keeps this unusual marriage so happy?

BY PAMELA MORGAN

hollywood's

■ Over the checkered, colorful half-century of its hectic existence, Hollywood has witnessed many strange, stormy and stirring marriages—Greer Garson and Richard Ney, Olivia deHavilland and Marcus Goodrich, Ty Power and Linda Christian, Charles Chaplin and Paulette Goddard—but never has there been one quite so strange as the marriage of Cary Grant and Betsy Drake.

I say strange because here are two motion picture stars who have achieved the quasi-impossibility of living the most un-Hollywoodlike life in Hollywood.

Ever since Howard Hughes flew them to Phoenix, Arizona, three Christmases ago and arranged for a quiet, out-of-the-way wedding ceremony, Mr. and Mrs. Grant have never posed for the press photographers in their home. They have never sat for a joint fireside interview. They have been inside a night club once in 38 months. They have avoided the more prominent of film-land's social and charity functions as a fox avoids the hounds.

They are hardly ever seen at a preview or a stage opening. Their name is conspicuous by its absence in the gossip columns. They will drop a word or two about their professional work to reporters but never anything about their home-life so that practically nothing about them has appeared in the public print.

Few people know where or how they first met or the background of their romance that ended in marriage, and neither of them particularly cares to discuss the subject. Other than for a dozen old friends and a handful of important business acquaintances, no one knows where they live or how they live except that on their combined earnings (Betsy gets $25,000 a picture and her husband ten times that amount plus a percentage of the picture's profits) they both live extremely well.

A press agent at Warner Brothers where the Grants starred in Room For One More, says, "It seems to me that they've drawn an iron curtain across their marriage. They're extremely cooperative when it comes to anything about their work, but just try and invade their privacy, and brother, you're up against a stone wall. I'm sure they're very happy, and why they should want to hide their happiness, I don't know. (Continued on page 74)

For Betsy's sake, Cary agreed to a husband-and-wife radio program. It laid an awful egg, but Betsy's still shooting for a full-fledged career, with his help.

strangest marriage

love at your own risk

(Continued from page 41) Lana is puzzled and hurt that she has never found real love. She is a kind, generous and beautiful girl who deserves happiness.

And, yet, her entire love-life history is one case after another of trying to kindle a new love in the embers of an old flame.

Starting with her earliest big romance, Lana fell out of love with Greg Bautzer into marriage with Artie Shaw; out of marriage with Shaw into love with Tony Martin; out of love with Martin, into love with Peter Lawford; out of love with Lawford, into love with Tyrone Power; off with Power on with Turhan Bey; Bey away, a marriage, and remarriage to Steve Crane; Crane was lost for new husband, Bob Topping; Topping was dissolved via Reno divorce for expected marriage to Fernando Lamas.

And before that event could take place, Lamas was lost (and acquired by Arlene)—and now it's Lex (lost by Arlene and acquired by Lana) in Lana's love-life.

Of course, it's mad and mixed up and a startling example of emotions shifting from high to low gear and back again too swiftly.

I believe the trouble is that Lana is still too emotionally immature and too beautiful (men swoon over her) to realize that real love arrives more slowly.

Even though she now believes she is in love with Lex, I hope she goes ahead with her plans to go to Europe this summer with just her little daughter, Cheryl, and gives herself a chance to discover whether this is real or just another mirage along the road.

THE recent ten-day "engagement" of Dan Dailey and Beetsy (the former Mrs. Keenan) Wynn reveals the folly of twice trying to drive down a One Way Street.

They had been traveling along happily at one time—soon after Beetsy and Keenan parted—and then, for reasons known only to Dan and Beetsy they reached—the end.

But, for some other reason, also best known to themselves, they revived their romance, Beetsy dashed for a Mexican divorce from Keenan, and for ten days she and Dan were back on the road headed for marriage.

Out of the blue and rather ungallantly, Dan announced that the marriage was off. Beetsy agreed. The short tour along the revival of an old love had once more reached the ROAD CLOSED sign.

Diana Lynn and John Lindsay are two others who recently discovered they couldn't stop and start, start and stop their marriage at will and still keep it on the road. I believe they sincerely tried to steer clear of rumors, of the difficulty of trying to blend their opposite careers (he is a successful architect), of the separations they were forced to make when her work kept her away from home so much.

But, in order to keep in a straight line when there are so many boulders in the way, the principals must be mature and wise perhaps beyond the years of Diana and John.

I'm not saying that wrecked marriages and romances cannot be repaired in Hollywood and the lovers drive on into permanent happiness. Look at the Ray Millands as happy as happy can be after a separation years ago which lasted ten months. It's wonderful to see the Millands spinning along so steadily and so happily after a patched-up break. And many others have "reconciled" happily, although you will find that they are usually mature and settled couples.

As long as I am playing traffic officer to Hollywood Lovers, I think I'll give a PARKING OVERTIME ticket to Marilyn Monroe and Joe Di Maggio.

Believe me, it is dangerous for lovers to wait too long to take their happiness—just as it is dangerous to speed too quickly into marriage.

There is a happy medium which involves knowing your heart, knowing you have found The One, and then making the jump with eyes wide open.

I think Marilyn and Joe are very much in love. I think they are good for each other. At one time I believed they would marry, particularly after they had been so careful in taking their time and realizing the hazards in their way, and there were many of them. Chiefly, Marilyn's studio and Marilyn, herself, realize she's a sexier attraction as a "Miss" than a "Mrs."

But, aren't they waiting too long? People who are really in love can sometimes be too cautious in remembering all the things against their happiness and ignoring all the fine things for it.

IN this category, I would certainly place Robert Taylor who just won't realize how smitten he is with Ursula Thiess and who should be signaled to the outside lane for DRIVING TOO SLOWLY.

Even the traffic directors realize that going too slowly can be as dangerous as speeding. (At least, in California, pokey drivers are shunted to the side of the road.)

The truth about Bob is, he has been in a wreck in the crack-up of his marriage to Barbara Stanwyck. But is this any reason why he should never again get behind the wheel of marriage and drive off with another partner? I don't think so. Apparently he does.

Doesn't he know that traffic authorities recommend starting driving soon after an accident lest one become timid and never drive again?

There's no one I know in Hollywood who can find more reasons for not falling in love again than handsome, likeable Bob who should stop to realize that there are many years of happiness ahead for him if he'll only take over the controls again.

On the other hand, if ever the brakes had slipped and a marriage seemed to be careening crazily down the road it's that of Betty and Mario Lanza. Just as he has done with his career, Mario seems to have taken his guiding hand off his family life.

In this case, the conduct is so unreasonable it cannot be considered typical. None the less it is an example in DANGER to other couples, particularly when success comes too swiftly and blindingly to one of the partners.

Mario is a case of temperament running wild. Some people say his actions are hinged on a condition perilously close to a nervous breakdown—and these people should not be driving careers or marriages.

Frankly, I don't know what is the trouble with Mario. I do know that, as this is written, he is perilously close to the edge of driving over a precipice with the devoted girl, who loves him and his family, hanging on with heartsick insecurity.

FRANK Sinatra and Ava Gardner are not taking the curves as wildly as Mario, but they, too, should take time to get their happiness under better control.

They have taken and are taking (though not as conspicuously as in their first year) dangerous chances. The Sinatras take their eyes off the road to indulge in wild quarrels—even to the point of Frankie's calling officers to evict Ava from their home in Palm Springs last fall.

I don't care how much two people proclaim they are in love, bickering and fights and quarrels in constant repetitions are not conducive to "getting there" and "staying there" on the road to happy marriage. You have to say for the battlin' Sinatras that at least, they're trying in the face of danger.

And this is more than you can say for Debra Paget who refuses even to go to Driving School where Love is concerned.

Deborah is 19—and she's never been kissed off-screen. She says she isn't interested in romance and that she's much happier staying out of the "love traffic," safe at home with her mother whom she adores.

I'm all for young girls taking their time. But to refuse to date or say anything but a determined, "No," to the eligible boys and men who ask her to dine or dance, can be just as much a mistake as playing the field.

No one expects Debra to fall madly in love at her age. She should, however, have the companionship and company of young men before she gets so set as a "career girl" that she finds they aren't asking her.

She is about the same age as Debbie Reynolds and Debbie appears to be a smart girl in realizing that the golden days of youth are for normal good times and dating as well as for devotion and dedication to just "getting ahead" as an actress.

Jane Powell is another youngster who has luckily found happiness in both her career and her family life with Garry Steffen and their two children—proving that "young marriages" can be very steady indeed on the Hollywood highway.

I hope it's clear to Debra, and to other young girls late in dating who may be reading this, that I'm certainly not advocating dating "wolves" or being seen around the nightclub circuit just for publicity purposes. Nothing is farther from my intention.

For instance, I think Pier Angeli is too young to be dating, as she has been doing both here and abroad, Kirk Douglas—not that Kirk's a wolf, heaven forbid.

But he is a mature man, married and divorced with two children, and is frankly too old and experienced for a girl of Pier age. If she has a real crush on him, and believe she has, I wish she would take sideglance at the signal marked "FREE WAY. DANGEROUS FOR AMATEUR DRIVERS."

You may remind me that Elizabeth Taylor is a little young for Michael Wilding too, and they seem to have found happiness. And I'll say you are quite right. But Mike may well prove to be the exception to the age rules on the drivers' license if they keep on the steady route they're traveling now.

Let me repeat—the Hollywood Highway of Love has proved to be slippery and dangerous, but by no means non-travelable by smart drivers!

God lightens men's souls. Clowns help men touch happiness. I thank Him every day for bestowing on me the gift of making people laugh.

PRAYER AND LAUGHTER

by Red Skelton

■ It's too late to do anything about it now, but I was born an awfully poor boy. I can remember as a child seeing a horribly skinny mouse drag himself out of a hole in our wall and hearing him squeak protestingly as if to say, "All right. I'll give up. Where's the cat?" That's how poor we were. I had to start earning money very early. I can remember sitting with my three brothers in open assembly at school and being the only one of the four of us not asleep in his seat; we had all been up since 4 o'clock trying to sell sandwiches to passengers on the early trains down at the station. That's how hard we had to scramble in our family. I got into lots of trouble. I can remember myself at 11 on a pitchman's platform desperately entertaining a crowd that was going to turn ugly as soon as it found out what I had already figured—my boss had run off with their money leaving me to face the music. That's the kind of scrapes I'd find myself in.

I can remember all these things but, you know, I don't much. They rarely come to mind when I think back. If I did, if they had made a strong impression on me, I probably would have grown up to be one of those grim, bitter boys you see around—and some people tell me I have the face for it, too. Instead, when I think back, I see myself as a kid to whom life was a shining promise because he had latched on to a magic power—the power to make people laugh. Now the point that becomes important here is that this kid got his magic power confused with the power of grown-up religion. (Continued on page 103)

a bachelor finds himself

(Continued from page 47) has talked often and freely about his visit to the clinic, his only reservation being a reluctance to give specific examples for fear that others may try to apply his own personal experiences to themselves. "Everybody is as different from the next guy as are his fingerprints," he said, "and things like this are strictly individual cases." With this in mind he asked that some of our conversation be kept off the record, and so this story will not go into detail about his stay at the clinic, except for those things that started the pendulum swinging back for Dan.

HE used this expression himself. "I've thought about writing a story and calling it 'The Swing of the Pendulum.' It's hard to explain, but I believe that each individual has his own goal in life and his own natural interests. Many times you go off on tangents—I know I have in the last two years—but sooner or later you come back to the basic things you really like. Until you do, you're only floating, because you're entirely off your course and have no direction. That's what the clinic did for me—they gave me a direction. And so I swung back."

As an example he said that in his boyhood he had loved horses, that he was never happier than in those hours he spent on a horse's back or in a stable. Yet with his zooming career and its attendant pressures, he did less and less riding, he saw less of the people he had been happy with, and he took on new interests that were foreign to his nature. Now he is once more back with horses, and with the same people, and he is content.

Something like this is such a simple remedy, yet few people can see their own lives in an objective manner. The clinic helped here, for they led Dan into a variety of interests, some of which he rejected and some of which he found to his liking. Few of them allowed him time to think about himself. While there he took up basketball, he lectured on the theater, he took a course in political philosophy and one in writing. They steered him into woodworking and although at first Dan had no stomach for it he soon found that wood cannot only become beautiful, but that the work accomplished a deeper purpose. "When you are chiseling a block of walnut down to a thin line and are still working on it to create something beautiful, you can't possibly worry about yourself. I found that I liked to work with my hands. I tried painting and sketching, but except for a pencil sketch of two horses' heads that I've framed and hung in my apartment, I didn't really care for it. I liked clay better. I liked the feel of it in my hands. There's a three-dimensional thing about it."

"What else?" I asked. "What else are you doing?"

He gave me that affable grin and said, "Well, there's the hunt club, and the horse shows, and both skiing in snow and water skiing. And I've written a few songs. And of course I'm active in the local Menninger chapter. I play around at writing stories, too."

"Poetry?" I said.

He grinned again. "Sure, I wrote a lot of it when I was a kid." He said it with a happy lack of self-consciousness.

"Dan, do you do all these things—there are a great many of them—out of a sense of urgency? Or do you really want to do them?" I asked.

He shook his head. "I've watched other people fight to 'keep busy', and it's a futile fight. The only time hobbies do you any good is when you really want to spend time at them. Not kill time."

We talked for a while about these varied interests of his. Since his return to Hollywood he has made a great many things of wood: bowls, candy dishes, even tables, and says he would do more if he didn't have to go over to George Montgomery's to borrow a lathe.

His connection with the local Menninger chapter consists mostly in promoting interests and funds so that a new center may be possible in Los Angeles. The clinic itself, which trains its own doctors, needs more money and a greater scope of operation.

Skiing is one of his newer interests. He had water skied since boyhood, but snow was a new experience. Otto Lang was preparing a film about skiing and wanted Dan to learn "just enough to look at home on them." Dan not only learned to ski in snow, but retaliated by teaching Lang to water-ski. He has recently become interested in baseball, too, for strangely enough, although Dan lived practically in the shadow of a big league ball park, he never cared for baseball as a boy. Then his role as Dizzy Dean in The Pride Of St. Louis turned him into an avid fan of the national sport.

The freedom to go barreling off to a ball game or Sun Valley, or a horse show or a hunt, means a great deal to Dan, and although he feels that marriage is a natural and happy way of living for a man, his recent solitude has been good for him. For some time he employed a manservant to keep his five-room apartment in order, but soon even Jess' presence bothered him. He let Jess go, not because the man wasn't capable, but because of the very fact that he was always there. Two other factors were involved: Dan was slated for several months without picture work and had every intention of utilizing his time away from home, and also he wanted to buy Early Autumn—and horses these days cost a small fortune to buy and board. "Having to keep house myself is worth it to me," Dan said. "I swing a mean dust mop anyway, and it's wonderful to be completely alone when I feel like it."

HE has lived in the apartment since his divorce and described it as, "early Dailey. It's an orderly cluttered sort of place, filled with things that have a particular meaning for me."

Books take up a lot of the space, and only recently Dan has found time to resume his reading. Years ago he had vowed to read the One Hundred Great Books of the World, as listed by literary authorities, and went through about 35 of them before he came to the period in his life when he harnessed himself with things he did not really want. Now once again there is a fat tome on the table by his favorite chair—Kant's "Critique of Pure Reason."

"Now I'm back to living just about the way I did before the war," Dan said. "All these things were part of my life and I let them go, but now that I'm alone they've come back, and I feel once more that I'm really home."

It wasn't easy for him to come back. When he first returned to Hollywood he startled everyone by boarding a dating merry-go-round and keeping it up night after night until friends felt he must surely give way. It was a frantic sort of existence and one completely unnatural to Dan. It was the period in which he was searching for the road home. "I did things I didn't like to do. I went to Hollywood parties. I even wore a tuxedo. I suppose I thought I should try this kind of life. I'd never had time for it before—I'd always had more to do than stand around for four hours and make small talk. Well, I tried it and I didn't like it. Soon, out of it all, I came back to my old friends, my old hobbies and haunts. I feel I'm pretty lucky that I've been able to keep myself from bouncing into marriage."

"What about another marriage?" I said.

He spoke without hesitation. "When I marry again, it will be a girl with whom I can live my own life. I'm interested in too many things, really, and I need somebody who can keep up with me and not take it as an affront that I should find happiness in things and places that aren't necessarily in our home. Somebody once referred to it as 'the sea of marriage', and that's the way I think of it. Sort of being one within ourselves, yet able to seek opposite shores."

DAN toyed with his fork for a moment. "You know, if and when I marry again, I'll feel that I'm really married for the first time. It's because I've grown up. I'm through wearing pretty girls on my arm like a bracelet. I used to criticize myself and criticize others, but by now I've evolved an honest appraisal of myself. For the first time in my life I know what I can do and what I can't do, and I know, too, what I can expect from other people. I've grown up, and I feel I'm ready for marriage now—if I find a girl who is also grown up enough to understand that we must lead our own lives. I've always wanted a big family and I still want it. There's still time."

I asked him about travel. "I'd like to go to Europe mainly because I love old things," he said. "I like the feel of a piece of old oak, of old stones, of leather. There's a solidity in old things that gives me peace. I guess that's why I love horses so much. There's a security and honesty in them."

"I like the way people live their lives in Europe. They take time to live." He picked up the breadbasket on our table and flung it down again. "The waitress here—she threw that down just like that. It meant nothing to her. Yet I have some Rumanian friends and some Hungarian friends, and when I go to their homes for dinner and they pick up a piece of bread and hand it to me, they do it as though they loved it. And they can have a bottle of wine that cost no more than a dollar but to them when they serve it to a guest it's a great and beautiful part of life. I can't get that feeling from the generation today, particularly in California. Everything here seems as though it's ready to blow away."

He smiled at me. "I'm talking in circles but I hope you know what I mean. I'm living now with ease and freedom, and it's so much better than it was. I can feel it in my work—a lot of the strain has disappeared. I can honestly say I've never been happier in my life."

I did know what he had meant. Contentment, plus a sort of happy surprise that he had found it, was written over his face and sprinkled through his speech. Modern psychology might say that Dan in his worship of things steeped in the solid past, was like many of us still yearning for security. But I had a strong feeling that he was glimpsing the peace of mind for which he'd been striving, that he'd found what he wanted. I told myself as I left him that if Dan Dailey could be given time to settle himself in his new-found way of living, he would truly be a happy man. . . . Now read how Dan almost lost his happiness—on the opposite page.

... And they say, "Oh, ain't you glad you're single!"

Beetsy is a real party girl, say Howard Duff and ex-husband Keenan Wynn.

Following the MS policy of bringing you all the news—here's a supplement to the Dailey Story: His on-and-off romance with Beetsy Wynn.

The story on the opposite page was written from an interview with Dan Dailey which took place less than one week before he and Beetsy Wynn, estranged wife of Keenan Wynn, announced that they would soon be married.

It shows quite clearly, we think, that Dan's subsequent decision not to marry was an exceptionally wise one. We do not mean this detrimentally to Beetsy. She is a greatly admired girl and a genuinely good person, but the facts would indicate that she and Dan would not have been happy together. As is obvious to anyone who reads the story, Dan only recently had found himself and was happy for the first time in years. He said in that interview, "I'm glad I've been able to keep myself from bouncing into another marriage." At the time he meant this sincerely, yet a few days later he surrendered to his deep need for a partner in life, to his personal feeling that a man should be married, and decided to marry Beetsy Wynn.

On the surface, Beetsy might seem to be an ideal wife for Dan. He has said he is sufficiently matured that he does not require beauty in a woman. Beetsy is not beautiful in the accepted sense of the word. She is attractive rather, perhaps striking. Her hair is dead white and contrasts handsomely with her deeply tanned skin. She has been married before and although the marriage was not a success, she at least has some conception of the qualities necessary in a woman who is to be a good wife. She is young enough to have the children that Dan would like to have, and she is exceptional in that she likes and knows horses as well as Dan does.

The objection is that Dan at this time needs an understanding girl who is completely settled, a girl who would be sensitive to Dan's thoughts and needs. According to his friends, Beetsy was not this type of girl. His friends, of whom he seems to have more than any actor in Hollywood, were genuinely worried when the announcement was made.

"Their main attraction for each other," said one, "seems to be that when they're together the repartée is like machine gun fire. They seem to be competing to see who can say the funniest things the fastest. Dan is naturally the life of the party, but Beetsy has to be the life of the party. She's a swell girl, but she's all party. She never lets up. If they married, I'm sure this would wear on Dan's nerves after a while."

Everyone says that Beetsy is a barrel of fun. On a dare she once rode a horse in a pelting rain, wearing a $10,000 mink coat. She drives a white Jaguar automobile and has a white poodle named Heathcliff. Dan has always detested small dogs, according to his friends, but tolerated Heathcliff because, "Beetsy is one woman who knows what makes me tick."

This may have been true, but Dan's friends were deeply concerned. One man who has known him many years put it this way, "Dan's recently begun to like the quiet life, dinners at home, music, candlelight, that sort of thing. He doesn't like to get dressed up and Beetsy does . . . she loves clothes. He's just redecorated his apartment, filled it with old silver and hunting prints, and he's refused publicity pictures of his home. I can't help but feel that Beetsy wouldn't fit into the picture. I've heard that one night she went to a party with Travis Kleefeld after he broke up with Jane Wyman. The party was way up on a hilltop, and according to the story, Beetsy and Trav had an argument. She took his car and left him stranded. When he beefed about it later she told friends, 'This guy has no sense of humor.' Maybe I'm off the beam, but I feel this couldn't be more wrong for Dan, and I know at least a dozen other people who feel the same way."

A lot of people like this were pulling for Dan. They had watched him date a long list of girls since the breakup of his marriage with Liz Hofert. There had been Ann Miller, Jane Nigh, Marie Allison, June Haver, the tennis dates with Barbara Whiting, the common interest in horses with Margo Loos, Pasadena socialite. They watched because they well knew that if Dan was to get back on his feet he needed time to find himself, and that unless he found the right girl, a new marriage would be much too premature. He gave them little cause for worry because, with the possible exception of Barbara Whiting, he did not seem serious about any of the girls he dated.

He met Beetsy for the first time at a horse show in San Fernando Valley a couple of years ago, but at that time he was married and so was she, and he concentrated solely on the horses. In the following months, they saw each other at various horse shows but it wasn't until last June (at which time Beetsy had long been separated from Keenan) that they met at Del Mar and began talking about things other than horses. They denied a romance for the remainder of the year, but during the Christmas holidays Dan and Beetsy announced they would be married.

CONTRARY to report, Keenan Wynn had been the first to know about it, and before he left for Korea to entertain troops, signed all the necessary papers in the event Beetsy should want a divorce while he was gone.

Said Beetsy, "Keenan was very nice about it and wished me happiness. I don't want to wait a year to marry Dan and I don't want to go to Nevada for six weeks, so I've decided to file in Mexico. The first possible date is January 2." She said that Dan might go with her to Mexico in which case they would be married there, but if not, that they would be married in Las Vegas.

Said Dan, in answer to the general surprise at the announcement, "We had met before but we kind of got together at Del Mar last June. We both are keen about horses. Beetsy has been riding some of my jumpers in shows and I've been driving her harness horses."

Beetsy flew to Mexico and obtained her divorce, but on January 8, less than two weeks later, announced, "I don't want to talk much about it. By mutual agreement, Dan and I decided last night that our proposed marriage would not work out. All plans are off and we will not be seeing each other any more."

At this writing there has been no reconciliation, and Dan's friends are extremely happy that he is still a free man. They feel it was a narrow escape, too close for comfort. Again, we say that this reaction is not meant in any sense as a lack of faith in Beetsy Wynn. She may possibly be the wife Dan needs, but, according to his own words, he is better off right now without a wife.

how the british took to alan

With the news that Alan was scheduled to play the lead in this picture of the heroism of the great British parachute troops, the antagonistic press broke loose: "Why," they wanted to know, "can't an Englishman play the hero in an especially English story of heroism?" There had been no American in the original story at all. What would they do . . . teach Ladd a British accent?

"No," came the reply. "The hero's part has been rewritten and he is now a Canadian, with an accent so like an American no one, unless he is Canadian, will know the difference."

That did it. And the anti-Alan Ladd smear campaign was on in earnest. It began sarcastically. A Torquay paper wrote: "It is pleasantly refreshing to discover that one American film company has realized British fighting men figured to some extent in World War II, even if Alan Ladd has to become 'Canadian' for the occasion."

About this time Errol Flynn's picture Objective Burma was being re-released. Seven years earlier it had been whisked off the screens because of the tortuous criticism and complaints against, "Americans winning our wars for us." They didn't seem to like the reissue any better than the original, so poor Alan was sailing into a double lion's den and British lion's den at that. He didn't know all the fuss he was stirring up; if he had, he would never have come.

"Which," say his producers, "is precisely why he wasn't told."

From Manchester came remarks typically polished and unpleasant:

"We've nothing against Alan Ladd personally, but why not our own Richard Todd, who like Trevor Howard and Anthony Steele actually wore the Red Beret and parachuted for England's glory?" (These three British actors were to be mentioned constantly in the next weeks, but Todd more than the other two.)

While things like this were being written and said, Alan Ladd was innocently saying in Hollywood that he was delighted to be going over to play in the movie because . . . "it will cement friendship and better understanding."

The next day Leonard Mosley wrote the nastiest blast of all for his paper:

"Why can't we make films about our war with our players just as America does with hers? Once upon a time there was a British war film in which the principal role was not played by an American star pretending to be a Canadian soldier, sailor, or, airman, nurse or WAAF. Alan Ladd is not proposing to play in an ordinary film but the story of one of Britain's greatest and most glorious efforts in World War II. I'm sick and tired of having Hollywood types lurking around every turret, cockpit, and machine gun post where the Union Jack waved during the war."

So spoke the press. The people, however, had something quite different to say. Readers wrote their editors "Entertainment is the aim. Who cares if Alan Ladd wins the war in a red beret or if Errol Flynn won it in Burma? If it is a documentary film you want, apply to the Minister of Information."

A theater owner in Birmingham said that he was delighted to have Alan Ladd play the part. "That way I know I'll be able to fill the house at every performance. With a British star that's rare."

The public was beginning to show its opinion, and in the face of it some writers began to pull in their literary horns a bit.

"It is a pity that a really nice chap like Alan Ladd had to get into all this hot water. He is a good type I understand, and for his own good ought to get out of the picture now and save feelings."

That's exactly what Alan would have done, had he been aware of the situation. However, standing on the very threshold of England, with thousands of fans, and newspaper readers waiting for him, he could only face the hostile press.

He listened carefully to the antagonistic British views, and said quietly, "Look, I didn't come over here to conquer anything or anybody. All I'm going to do is play the part of a guy who comes to England to learn to fight. Got that? I said learn to fight, not teach."

At the week's end, not many people cared where Alan came from. The Sunday Graphic came up with the fan side of the story. "Welcome, Mr. Ladd," they headlined, "And Shut Up To His Critics."

Looking back over the years Alan remembered how as a kid he fought against the strong English accent that branded him "Limey" in school. His mother was English, his father a Scot, and the family suffered the ridicule of being "foreign." Alan joked about it. "I'd surely like to have that accent back now."

Gradually the press was won over. They were impressed by the star's willingness to submit himself to a gruelling three-week commando course in which he not only had to master 400 yards of 20 obstacles, but had to live like an ordinary recruit all day. The only favoritism he received was being allowed to go home to Sue Carol at night.

Then there were the rugged days of shooting on location in Wales; and the day the Ladds invited his entire fan club to tea at their house near London. One young lady had traveled all the way from Italy for it. Best of all the writers had never found a star nearly as cooperative with them as Alan Ladd. Criticism was nearly at an end . . . but not quite.

Although Ladd is the only American in the picture and is solely responsible for providing a good many actors with work, a few British players still felt he had somehow cheated them.

Ladd and his producers waited with no little worry, but the tide of ill-feeling passed with the help of many encouragingly intelligent remarks. Someone pointed out that there had been no loud outcries when British actor Godfrey Tearle played Franklin D. Roosevelt; nor had any come recently while Stewart Granger picks juicy picture plums in Hollywood.

An editor from Derby put the capper on the hassle. "Let's silence these petty outcries," he wrote. "Let's consider how amazed Alan Ladd must be at the bitterness and cold shoulder reception. Frankly we haven't a he-man star left in England to even offer as a replacement. May that settle that."

And so it seemed to do. For now the Ladds have settled down, and are enjoying what they came to do . . . work and see England. Mind their own business, and help one another with loving-kindness. All Britain has seen this family life and love in action. And the British are impressed. The Ladds have won themselves a secure place in the English hearts at last.

the gang's all here

(Continued from page 51) various French signs on board the ship. One of them, hanging over the entrance to the beauty salon, announces "Coiffeurs Dames." He spotted it the second day out and said, "What do the dames need with chauffeurs?"

The only thing that marred our trip was the bad news about Jezebel, our faithful old boxer dog. We had wanted to bring her and the dachshund Fritz along with us but there's a quarantine that forbids it, and so we had to leave them at home. I had news before we sailed that Jez had been poisoned and died, and I kept this sad news from Alan. He loved her so much. But Lonnie unwittingly let the cat out of the bag. She'd been told the dog was ill, and not knowing she shouldn't say anything, mentioned it one day. On Alan's birthday, in fact. He looked at me right away and asked point blank if the dog were dead. I couldn't back out of it then, of course, and had to tell him. It set him back quite a bit, and it wasn't until our landing in England that he began to snap out of it.

The landing itself snapped us all into a state of excitement. David was the only one who slept at all that night, and we all climbed out of our bunks before dawn to make the landing in the British tender sent alongside. By the time we boarded the smaller boat the sun was beginning to come up and we could see the harbor. David, whose idea of any place other than the United States is that it should look like the Hawaiian Islands (the result of our Honolulu trip last year), let out a small gasp when he saw land for the first time.

We were really amazed, at that hour, to see so many of the press waiting for us when we reached Plymouth. The poor souls had made the eight-hour trip all the way from London in order to meet us, and we felt a kind of personal responsibility for the fact the boat had arrived at such an inconvenient hour. If we'd slept lightly, these people hadn't had any sleep at all.

We had our first sample of British courtesy when we went through customs at Plymouth. The inspectors were so polite (like English butlers in the movies, Laddie said) that we all felt like bowing to them. The boat train took us directly to London, where we were met at Paddington station by an immense crowd. There was a regular barrage of flashbulbs and hundreds of people, and we were thrilled and proud at the wonderful reception they gave Alan.

By that time it was afternoon and we were all pretty tired, so we postponed seeing the sights in London and drove directly by car to our new home in the country. We saw enough of London that afternoon, however, to set the children howling with excitement. Lonnie was particularly upset that we were driving "on the wrong side of the street," and Carol Lee and Laddie kept pointing out the quaint old lamp posts, the cobblestones, the frequent and lovely little parks, the spots that had been bombed, and the many old buildings. "It doesn't look at all like Honolulu," observed David.

We drove through perfectly lovely countryside toward our home, and when we were almost there Alan mentioned he'd noticed a taxi had been trailing us for some distance. Eventually the cab pulled alongside, filled with fans who had followed our car all the way from Paddington station. All they wanted, they explained, was Alan's autograph. He was deeply touched, knowing that money is scarce in England today, and that the long ride had cost them a small fortune. He suggested they visit him at Shepperton Studios and needless to say, they later took him up on the invitation.

We hadn't finished exclaiming over our Surrey house before we were served tea, our first real English tea served in England. Since then a day hasn't gone by that we hadn't joined the British in their tea-time custom, and even David, whose cup is filled with more milk than tea, thinks the ritual is just about as good an idea as hot dogs at a baseball game.

Alan and I have been pleasantly surprised at the children's reaction. We had hoped they'd be pleased and interested, but their excitement and ability to absorb the many new things they see and hear has been most gratifying. Their interest is contagious, and both Alan and I are "seeing" more this time than we did three years ago when we came over for a Command Performance.

We were no sooner unpacked and had our things hung neatly in the closets than we were all whisked away to North Wales where Alan was to start work immediately on the picture Red Beret. We lived in a town that certainly lives up to the Welsh reputation for un-pronounceable names... Penrhynedeudraeth. We were there three weeks but already we've lost the knack of rolling the name around our tongues. The town, which I refuse to spell out again, not only obliged with a typical Welsh name, but it also afforded some of the most breathtaking scenery any of us had ever seen. Plus a castle. A rambling big place in Carnarvon that was the home of King Edward II in the 14th century. It was the first real castle the children had ever seen, and we couldn't have chosen a better one. They poked into every nook and cranny and I think were a little disappointed that we didn't see any ghosts, an omission which was all right with Carol Lee and me.

From there I went with Alan to Oxford, the nearest town to the Royal Air Force base called Abingdon where the company worked more than two weeks. The children stayed home in Surrey for that period, except for the few days they visited the base. Alan and I were so glad we had the children come up at the particular time they did, for they saw the many regiments of troops that were filmed for some of the master shots. The best of all were the several companies of Scottish troops, dressed in their traditional kilts and carrying their bagpipes.

WHILE the company was shooting at the R.A.F. base we stayed at a charming hotel in Oxford, and while Alan worked, I took our brood around the historic old college town. Oxford University is divided into many colleges and each has its own church or chapel, and its own enclosed campus. We thought Christ's Church the prettiest, and Lonnie at last saw the college she'd heard so much about—Magdalen, which has a miniature national park inside its walls.

From Oxford the five of us went to Warwick and saw the proud old castle there. We were mightily impressed by its turrets and towers and battlements, to say nothing of the exquisite furnishings in the living quarters. David was sure that he'd see a knight in full armor come clattering across the courtyard at any moment.

And then we went to Stratford-on-Avon. We saw Shakespeare's birthplace and the church where he is buried, and Anne Hathaway's house. I had seen all these things when I was much younger but didn't remember much about them, and can only hope that our own children will never forget. Although, as I told Alan later, they were so engrossed that I can't see how they possibly could forget.

Poor Alan went right on working while the rest of us were sight-seeing. He worked ten hours every day until the company began working at night instead, and then in late October the motion picture companies all over England went on strike in protest against working at nights or on Saturdays. That gave him a few days off and the hope that there'd be no more night work.

When shooting at Abingdon was finished I drove back to Surrey with Alan, and on the way we stopped for the night in a very small village. At the door of the town's only restaurant stood a small boy, dressed in clothes that were no more than tattered rags. His eyes lighted up when he saw us get out of the car, and he ran to Alan with a pencil stub and a scrap of paper. "Please, sir," he said in a thin little voice, "could I have your autograph? They said you'd be coming through here, and I've waited three days."

Well, even if we weren't the sentimental twosome that we are, I believe we'd have spilled tears right then and there. Alan was so upset he didn't know which way to turn. "Do you think we could get him some decent clothes?" he said.

That was all I needed. The next morning I took the boy to a store, intending to get him a new suit and shirt, but my intentions got tangled up with my heart. He stuff, just kept gulping away at their tea.

When the party was over they began asking David for his autograph and the idea didn't go over so well with our youngest. He signed, all right, but he grumbled the whole time. Half of them got his autograph, and the other half probably took pity on him because he looked so utterly exhausted. A couple of the girls tried to stay behind when the buses were getting ready to take off, but we managed to get them herded back to their seats. Then, as Alan was waving goodbye, one of them thought to ask him for his handkerchief. Another requested his tie, a third his cigarette, and when I saw that this thing might get beyond control I signalled him to duck into the house and I'd take over with the waving department.

Soon after the party we bought a male dachshund puppy and named him "Beret" after Alan's picture. He will be a boy-friend for Fritz when we return to the States, and I do hope he will eventually take the place in our hearts left by poor old Jez. He's fast winning it right now, as he takes turns sleeping with different members of the family every night, and it's got to the point where Laddie and Carol Lee have an argument every evening as to which one gets Beret.

The Ladd clan felt a little out of place on Hallowe'en. It isn't celebrated here, so we dressed up the youngest kids and took them to the few American homes we knew of for the traditional bell ringing. They felt better about the whole thing when they were told about Guy Fawkes Day. It was on November 5th, 1605, that the rebel was caught trying to blow up Parliament, and ever since then the English children celebrate on November 5th by ringing doorbells and asking for "a penny for the Guy." David and Lonnie got in on that one full swing and decided it was even better than Hallowe'en, for after the doorbell business comes the burning of Guy Fawkes in effigy, then firecrackers.

Now that we're back in Surrey again, which really does seem like home after all the travelling, we're beginning to have an opportunity to have our London friends visit us here. The entertaining is done mostly at night, for in the daytime the children and I are often going to London.

It has been a wonderful aid to their education. We saw the changing of the guard at Buckingham Palace, and David spotted little Prince Charles at one of the windows. We went to Madame Tussaud's, where Lonnie was deeply impressed by the wax image of Sleeping Beauty, mostly I suppose because of the mechanism inside the figure which makes the chest rise and fall with a breathing motion. David was home with a cold that day and afterwards listened rather glumly to our glowing accounts of the wax museum. He brightened only when he learned we hadn't seen the Chamber of Horrors without him.

We fed the pigeons at Trafalgar Square and learned all about Admiral Nelson, and at the Tower of London we were escorted by one of the Beefeaters in his picturesque red and black uniform. We saw the crown jewels and the Imperial crown the Queen will accept at the Coronation in June. Carol Lee was most impressed, I think, by the Tower ravens and their story. The legend goes that if the ravens ever leave the tower, England will fall. I think all four of the children really worried about that one. I pointed out that the Tower has been graced by its ravens for hundreds of years, but despite my assurance I felt just the smallest twinge of anxiety. For all of us have come, in these last few months, to regard the English people as our staunch friends, and England itself as our second home.

was such a beautiful, sad looking little thing, and by the time we finished shopping I'd bought him not only a suit and shirt, but socks and shoes and two pairs of trousers as well. He was delighted, of course, but I could see that he was worried. As I parted from him he hesitated a minute and then looked up at me with those big eyes. "Please, mum," he said, "are you certain you can afford all this?"

I went back to our room and told Alan about it, and while I was pretty choked up myself I noticed that he swallowed hard a couple of times.

THE location work over, Alan began working at Shepperton Studios in London, and the rest of us settled down in our home. The first Sunday we were back we gave a party for the members of one of Alan's oldest fan clubs here in England, and more than 400 fans arrived. They had come from all over England, some of them having traveled more than 30 hours to reach our house. We had arranged to have buses pick them up in London and bring them to our place in Surrey, and it was quite a sight to see those kids piling out of the buses and filing into the house. We had tea for them (naturally), and a great deal of food, but they were so excited they hardly made a dent in the solid

GREYHOUND

(Continued from page 65) My own feeling is that this sort of withdrawal which they practice is Cary's reaction to his second marriage. He was married to Barbara Hutton, you know, and that's worse than being married to Liz Taylor. I mean you're on exhibition all the time. Grant's mentality is basically British. I think living in a fish bowl with Barbara Hutton outraged his sense of privacy, and that's why I think he and Betsy live as they do, up there on Cloud 49, far removed from the world."

Before the Grants sailed on a freighter to Hong Kong (this business of taking a vacation on a freighter is something Cary picked up from his good friends, the Laurence Oliviers) Betsy Drake evinced surprise that her marriage should have become a target for the curiosity-seekers.

"Cary and I," she explained, "live a very simple and quiet life because we happen to be that kind of people. Nightclub life just doesn't appeal to us. I was in a Hollywood nightclub once before I was married, that was with my agent. And I've gone to one club with Cary since."

"What have we been doing since our marriage? That's a funny question. We've been working, of course. After the wedding I had to return to Warners' where I was doing Pretty Baby with Dennis Morgan. And Cary works all the time, of course... You say what have we been doing outside our professional careers? Well, we went to New York on a trip. I guess you could call it a honeymoon."

"I mean who really cares about our personal lives? Who cares that we're taking a freighter to Hong Kong? I don't know how long we'll be gone, but does it really matter? We're just like other married couples. Perhaps it isn't exciting but we stay home at nights, and yes, I'll admit it—we watch television. We think the Lucille Ball show is wonderful and so are a lot of others. Cary is a fine judge of comedy, you know, and he thinks Lucille and Desi are superb."

"About our house? It's a small house. Cary bought it before we were married. Two bedrooms, that's all. He's in the process of doing some remodeling. No, I'm staying out of it. He knows what he wants and I'm well out of it. We have two in service, a man who looks after the cars and the heavy work, and a cook. I love to cook but I'm not a very good one. A few months ago, however, I took over the cooking job when the cook was out. I broiled some steaks. I guess I must have forgotten about them or something, because Cary came dashing into the kitchen. They'd caught on fire, and he threw water all over them, and well, I don't do the cooking any longer."

"How do I like living with Cary? I love it. He's a very neat and fastidious person. He's mature, intelligent. It's a great break for me to have a husband like him. He's an experienced man of the world. I couldn't possibly tell you how much he's taught me. He's really a very fine person, and I'm trying to be objective. A little while ago you mentioned about our rehearsing with the children in Room For One More.

"Cary always likes to rehearse before a picture gets under way. He's very thorough and very conscientious. His acting seems effortless but I've learned that an awful lot of hard work lies behind it."

"Do we hope to have any children? Yes, we'd adore a few. But right now we've got to get packed for that trip to Hong Kong. Cary worked very hard on Dream Wife with Deborah Kerr. She's a really wonderful actress. It's a very funny picture, too."

That is about the lengthiest interview Betsy Drake Grant has given since her marriage about her marriage. She claims she is ecstatically happy, and friends say that as regards her domestic life she certainly is, but that she wishes her acting career might progress at a faster rate.

As for Grant, it comes somewhat as a surprise to the movie colony that after so many glamor girls, he should find tranquility, domestic bliss, and peace of mind in marriage to a so young and girl-next-door type as Betsy Drake.

Grant is 15 years older than Betsy who is approaching 30, and in his two previous tries at matrimony he walked down the aisle with Virginia Cherrill in 1934, and Barbara Hutton in 1942. Both of these women were, and are, continental sophisticates. Virginia was the beautiful blonde actress who played the poor flower girl in Charlie Chaplin's great picture, City Lights. Eight months after he was married to Miss Cherrill, Grant found himself in a sanitarium, and the marriage was on the rocks. Following the divorce, the first Mrs. Cary Grant married the Earl of Jersey which will give you some small idea of the league in which she plays ball.

As for Barbara Hutton, everyone knows about her wealth, her background, her husbands. The reason she and Cary couldn't make a go of the marriage was that for years she had been accustomed to having her own way about practically everything, a condition which Grant as a man and a bread-winner in his own right, could not accept.

The point, however, is that no one ever expected Cary Grant to choose as a third wife the kind of naive, unworldly girl he might Pygmalionize. But that, figuratively speaking, is what he did.

While all of his friends were expecting that eventually he would marry someone like Phyllis Brooks or Ginger Rogers, with both of whom he carried on for a good while. Or, forsaking them, marry a sophisticate in the image of his first or second bride, Cary Grant was falling in love with a 25-year-old neophyte of an actress who dressed simply in tweeds, and seemed so bashful that her voice blushed when she used it.

I don't think the strange story of this Cinderella love affair has ever been told, and to understand the severe privacy, the inviolable quietude of their marriage, one must first be acquainted with the background.

FIVE years ago when Cary Grant was returning to New York aboard the Queen Mary—he had spent his vacation in England, the land of his birth—he happened to catch sight of a young girl who aroused his interest.

This young girl was Betsy Drake. She was coming home after four months of playing the female lead in the British production of Deep Are The Roots. She had never met Cary Grant in her life, and she had no idea that her looks, her figure, her attitude had awakened in Grant the desire to make her acquaintance.

Oddly enough, Grant, an experienced man of the world, didn't know exactly how to go about asking Miss Drake for a shipboard date. He couldn't put himself in the awkward position of trying to pick her up while she strolled around the deck; and he is too much the gentleman to essay the direct approach and face the direct rebuff.

Fortunately for Cary, a very good friend of his was aboard the Queen Mary. Cary went to Merle Oberon and explained his problem.

"Don't worry," Merle said. "I'll ask her if she'd like to take dinner with us at the captain's table." (Continued on next page)

When Merle Oberon knocked on Betsy Drake's cabin, the young actress was surprised. When Merle said, "Mr. Cary Grant and myself should like to have you as a dinner guest tonight," the actress grew so nervous she began to stutter. "Th-th-that's very kind of you," she said. "B-b-b-but I don't think I can. You see, I don't have any formal clothes with me."

Merle Oberon smiled. "Who cares?" she said. "Come along."

That's how it began. Grant, who is as tactful and thoughtful as any Don Juan who ever lived, refused to wear dinner clothes during the rest of the trip. Sports jackets and grey flannels were his nightly garb just so Betsy wouldn't feel out of the social swim.

By the time the Queen Mary docked at the Cunard pier in New York, Grant was pretty well smitten. He'd fallen in love with a girl unlike any other he'd ever met. He was surprised, too, when he learned that Betsy had once been under contract to Hal Wallis at Paramount but despising Hollywood, had left of her own accord.

How did Betsy feel? Put yourself in the position of a poor girl who's been raised in the Greenwich Village section of New York; who has never had very much money; whose parents are separated, and who, because of this, has known very little happiness in her youth.

BETSY may have been poor in material gifts in childhood but she was rich in dreams. All her life she wanted to become a famous stage actress like Helen Hayes or Katharine Cornell. However, the chances seemed remote because, in addition to stuttering when she got nervous and being near-sighted, she had no contacts with show people.

Under these lowly circumstances, many girls would give up—but not Betsy. She started from the bottom. She went from one show producer's office to another looking for any sort of stage work. She'd had no experience, and they turned her down. Someone finally told her to go see an agent.

Eventually she landed one or two modeling jobs posing for illustrations in the large mail-order catalogues, but still her heart was set on the Broadway stage. A theatrical agent named Jane Broder agreed to represent her. Jane took a liking to Betsy and gave her an in-between job, running the telephone switchboard at her office.

One afternoon Betsy, after taking lunch at Walgreen's Drug Store, heard that Herman Shumlin was casting a play. She went around to see him. Shumlin is a kind man. He looked at the mousey little girl, heard her talk, and liked her manner.

"I tell you what," he said. "I don't have anything for you, but there's a Hollywood producer in town, fellow named Hal Wallis. He likes girls like you—the off-beat type."

"Thank you very much, Mr. Shumlin," Betsy Drake said, "but I don't want to go to Hollywood. I want to work here, on Broadway."

"Don't be foolish," Shumlin advised.

Betsy thought about it a little and trotted back to her agent who arranged for a test with Hal Wallis, then sent the child to a dramatic coach. The coach advised Betsy to appear before Wallis in high heels and a low-cut gown. "Don't be silly," Betsy said with great honesty. "I have less than a dollar to my name, and I don't intend to spend that on anything except food."

When Hal Wallis met the deep-throated young woman he asked her to play the role of a blind English girl in a scene from I Walk Alone.

The following day he phoned Betsy's agent. "How much do you want for the that little Drake girl?" he queried.

"Five hundred a week," Jane Broder said.

"Be not foolish. She's a newcomer, has had no experience."

"All right, Hal, what do you consider a fair price?"

"Tell you what. I'll give her $350 a week, and half of any dough we get on loanouts."

"It's a deal," Jane Broder agreed.

So Betsy trained out to Hollywood, only to find that Wallis had no part for her. She hung around, lonely and fearful, asking for any type of acting work. But each week all she got was her salary check. It was more money than she'd ever earned before, but she was unrequited, frustrated, disillusioned.

After six months Wallis offered to keep her on at her original salary. "I'd rather go back to New York," Betsy decided. Few people understood this girl. Why give up a good salary and go back to job-hunting?

But back to New York Betsy came. She landed a job in the English production of Deep Are The Roots. For four months she played up and down the British provinces. Then she caught the Queen Mary home. That's when Cary Grant came into the picture.

THIS falling in love with Grant, the chance meeting, the strange set of circumstances all seemed to have happened so quickly, Betsy couldn't quite keep her equilibrium.

Back in New York, Cary mentioned something about returning to Hollywood. Under the proper auspices he was sure she would like the place. And let's face it, what better sponsor could a girl have in Hollywood than Cary Grant? Here was one of the most talented light comedians of the day, an actor every studio was clamoring for, a star who could name his own vehicle, his own leading lady, his own director.

When Betsy Drake showed up in Hollywood, and Cary was asked about his relationship with the young actress, he said quite simply, "I first saw Betsy in England where she was appearing in Deep Are The Roots. I met her aboard ship on the way home. She hadn't made any pictures in Hollywood, but I thought she was committed to producer Hal Wallis. When she told me this association had been terminated, I introduced her to Don Hartman who was looking for a newcomer for Every Girl Should Be Married."

Grant also spoke to David Selznick who was then in production, and Selznick agreed to share Betsy's contract with RKO.

While Betsy was at RKO, she and Grant were virtually inseparable. He coached her, rehearsed her, taught her, encouraged her, while Hollywood cats kept saying to each other, "What does he see in her? Certainly she's no great beauty. She doesn't have money, and she doesn't have style, at least, not the style he's accustomed to."

In a way they were right—only the style in femininity that Grant had been accustomed to wasn't necessarily what he wanted to marry.

What he had been looking for all along, although no one would believe him; was a wife who would like the simple life, "quiet and relaxed." In 1932 when he had first been married to Virginia Cherrill, he had told reporters that he planned to live a retiring life. "You know," he said, "quiet and relaxing." They had laughed at him, because they knew Virginia, and they were right. But their estimation of Grant was incorrect. He actually meant what he said. He wanted a wife who would be content to stay away from the mad whirl.

IN Betsy Drake he has found such a wife.

Here is a girl of integrity, self-sufficiency, intellect and talent. While she desperately wants a full-fledged career of her own, she is wise enough to realize that her basic career is keeping her husband happy. She knows that without Grant's assistance she would not be where she is today. She knows that it was for her sake that he agreed to one of those husband-and-wife radio programs, Mr. and Mrs. Blandings, shortly after their marriage. The radio program didn't come off, and as a matter of fact, both Betsy and Cary are being sued for $15,250 by their team of script writers.

Like his good friend Humphrey Bogart, Grant is a mature man deeply and almost irrevocably set in his ways. He hates disruption of any sort and is a stickler for neatness. For years now his obsession with clothes has been a Hollywood joke, and it is said facetiously, albeit with a modicum of truth, that there is no tailor who wants Grant's business. He is so finicky when it comes to fit that hardly any tailor will undertake the job of clothing him. Leo McCarey, who knows Grant well—they used to rent adjoining houses down at Santa Monica beach—says jokingly that Cary is a frustrated haberdasher. As a matter of record, Grant at one time owned haberdashery outlets on both coasts.

Grant refuses to lead his private life in public and feels that after 20 years of hard work in the business, he is well enough established to do without stories of his home-life, his love-life, his hobbies and his habits.

Neither a joiner nor an organizer, he bothers no man, and wants no man to bother him. Like the good wife she is, Betsy has adopted his ways, which is why relatively nothing has been printed of their marriage.

"Just because we are happily married," Betsy says, "I don't think that's particularly newsworthy. I read about divorces and marital quarrels in the movie magazines, but all our friends seem very well adjusted, so that such news is very far removed from us. It's been my experience that there are more happy marriages in Hollywood than most people think."

Frank Vincent, Grant's agent, who died a few years ago, was once asked why Cary refused to discuss his marriages or home-life with the press or pose for extensive home layouts.

"His reticence may seem strange to you," Vincent pointed out, "but you must never lose sight of one fact. Even though Cary became an American citizen in 1942, he is essentially an Englishman, and to an Englishman his home is his castle. He looks upon it as the last refuge of his privacy. Cary has never cried the blues and never shouted his happiness. Marriage to him is a very private affair, and he simply refuses to give out progress reports on its welfare. He never has and as far as I can see he never will."

END

they broke all the rules

A few weeks ago a visitor was in Marty Melcher's office. The phone rang. Marty picked up the receiver, listened for a moment, then said, "Can't talk to you now. Somebody's here. Get to you later." As he hung up he said, "That was my wife."

The visitor pondered on this clipped conversation after he left the office, and finally came to the conclusion that it was all right. "After all," he shrugged, "they've been married almost two years."

It was this acceptance of the fact that there was no need for further cooing that inspired MODERN SCREEN to take stock of the marriage of Doris Day and Marty Melcher. But, of course, there were other reasons. One of them was that Doris and Marty, according to the opinions of most marriage counselors, were going about making a success of their union in entirely the wrong way. Another was in deference to that common Hollywood practice which has a good percentage of the guests present leaning toward a companion just after the ring has been slipped on the bride's finger and whispering, "It won't last six months." This survey is dedicated to these cynical beings.

According to the experts, Doris Day and Marty Melcher are breaking the cardinal rule of matrimony: She's working. The authorities, almost unanimously, agree this is dynamite. They say that the male, in order to maintain his masculinity at a proper level, must be the sole breadwinner. When a woman works a marriage is supposed to fall apart at the seams because it frustrates Dad.

Well, to this hour, Marty Melcher hasn't been frustrated, nor is he even mildly unhappy about Doris' working. He is delighted, possibly because he is proud of her achievements and possibly because he's been so busy being happy he hasn't had time to read the rules.

ANOTHER bad thing, according to the chaps who know, is a man and wife working in the same business—if she must be employed at all. This is also supposed to have an effect on Pop's pride. It's no doubt dates back to the emergency years when a husband and wife would often toil side-by-side in a factory of some sort—and Mom often wound up as her old man's foreman. Doris and Marty are in the same business, and in a sense she is his boss, because Marty acts as his wife's agent. That is not supposed to make for marital happiness. It could curb a man's tongue when he was on the edge of winning a family argument. His wife could not only have the last word, but the last two words: "You're fired!"

But, then almost everything that has happened to Marty and Doris Melcher has been opposed to the book. Ordinarily a man first sees a girl across a crowded room, as the lyricists say. Not Marty. At the end of a hard day at the office, he was asked to give up his plans for the evening to take a client, one Doris Day, whom he had never seen, to a radio broadcast. It wasn't a date. Marty was told to see that she got there on time, didn't get run over, didn't sign anything, didn't forget her script, got the proper introduction on the air and a dozen other things an agent is supposed to look after when a client works. If he said he was delighted he was only being polite.

If you have ever seen an agent escorting a star to a public function, you have seen unadulterated, sophisticated boredom. It is a function only with these boys, no matter how beautiful and glamorous the doll is. Marty, on this first "date" with Doris, was no different from the others. As a matter of fact, he had personal problems at the time that kept him out of the mood for enjoying the company of any lady. He was separated from his wife, Patty Andrews, and it was beginning to look as though it would end in a divorce. Consequently, until the broadcast was over and Doris was escorted to her car to shove off for home, there was absolutely nothing personal in his feelings for her. Doris, however, was hungry, so Marty took her to a café to get a late snack. It was over a bowl of chili that he realized for the first time that she was actually a woman.

Now the way it is suppose to happen, again according to the men who write the books about such things, is that he should have seen her picture in the office files, or seen her sitting in someone else's office, or at a party, and he should have turned to someone and stammered excitedly, "Who's that?"

EVEN the engagement was 'way off the accepted. There wasn't any. There was no formal discussion of marriage. There was no proposal. There was no recounting of qualities. By the great Lord Harry there wasn't even an engagement ring! It's enough to make a man like John J. Anthony sick to his stomach.

It just, as the happy pair lamely explain it, happened. No marriage can possibly be sound without the memories of how the boy carried the ring around in his watch pocket for a month before he had the nerve to show it to his intended, or how he got down on one knee, in the silliest position, and asked for the lady's hand in matrimony. All that took place with Marty and Doris is that a year or so after they'd been chumming around together somebody said something about something that would take place "after we're married," and the subject was dropped.

As for the wedding! No matter how little fuss a couple wants, the bride and groom have to go to some bother. If it is a quiet affair they might leap into a car with a few friends and drive madly off to some Greta Green, singing and laughing like demented. A little more formal manner is for the husband-to-be to phone a few intimate friends and ask them to drop by City Hall and cry a little while the ceremony takes place. In Hollywood, or in big city social circles, a gala wedding is generally considered only proper, with tents on the lawn and caterers and detectives guarding the presents and at least 500 guests.

But not Doris and Marty. There have been a number of different versions, but it is generally conceded that they were digging in Doris' garden or something and one of them asked the other how he or she would like to take a shower and go get married. They even had to pluck witnesses off the street they say. Many eminent counselors would give a couple starting out in this haphazard fashion less than the usual 60 days.

Another big mistake that Doris Day and Marty Melcher made was in choosing the home in which they would live. Marty, a man with a few dollars in the bank, able to finance a swanky home for his bride, should have had a stern talk with Doris after the ceremony. He should have told her that her money and possessions were hers—and he didn't want to have anything to do with them. He should have said they'd either sell her home or burn it to the ground—and they would live in a house of his choosing, one he had bought with his own money.

But it wasn't like that. Any good authority will tell you that they were just too doggone practical about the whole thing. They looked around Doris' home, Marty agreed he kind of liked the set-up, and he went to his place and got his stuff and moved in. Somebody should have warned them.

The experts usually look with considerable alarm on a marriage which unites a son or daughter as well as the happy couple. This is a hazard, for, they say, there is a tendency for the new father to become jealous of the child—and for the mother to side with her own flesh and blood in the event of a dispute. There are all sorts of other dangers, including the kid resenting another disciplinarian. But the jealousy, and lack of control held by the foster parent is the main rub.

The Melchers don't know about this, either. Doris is not a demanding mother, but she is something of a tyrant about certain things, and her son, Terry, is not a pampered lad by any means. He has, however, an ally. Marty. If he is obliged to perform some chore a small boy figures he

Ava Norring went to Hollywood with the help of publicity about her many malapropisms. Her most celebrated remark concerned her husband who, she said, overheard her mistakes, "then went around my behind and told people."

can't make and still play third base on the sand lot ball team, he turns to Marty for assistance. And he gets it. Marty understands and helps out, and they both swear an oath that Doris will never find out. It's not supposed to be that way at all. But it is. As a matter of fact, Doris has been heard to complain that the guys gang up on her. Somehow the three of them get along as though they were always together and Marty really belonged.

NOW TAKE the matter of business. If you ask her, Doris will tell you that Marty handles all of the financial and contract matters exactly to her satisfaction. They never have a harsh word—and he discusses everything with her quietly and calmly. If that were true, they could get the records of their conversations in the Smithsonian Institute. No theatrical relationship has ever been a bed of roses, but the relationship between an artist and her manager is something like the Dempsey-Tunney fight at least once a week. Now a manager can get away with murder with a client to whom he is not bound emotionally. The worst that can happen is that she'll take her business elsewhere, and he'll be glad to see it happen.

But if he's married to the girl this can't happen. The fights, therefore, have to be to the finish. Somebody has got to win. It would seem, if we are to believe the authorities, that these differences of opinions would be carried on into the home, at dinner and far into the night. But not with the Melchers. Marty knows his business, and when his wife calls during office hours with some hare-brained scheme such as artists only can come up with, he listens, then says no. If she persists, he says the things he'd like to have said in the first place—and they might possibly hang up with little regard for one another. But the minute he steps in his front door at night, he's hubby coming back from the store—and he doesn't want to talk shop. If Doris ever has the urge to continue the discussion the most she ever does is quietly make plans to get him on the phone at the office again in the morning. Other than that they never let the artist-manager relationship in the house. They may not realize it but by doing this they are making jerks out of the learned lads who say such a situation is not possible.

One of the major contentions of the book writers is that it is not possible for a marriage to be truly happy if a woman has anything but making dinner, doing the dishes and keeping the home fires burning on her mind after they both come back from work. This is impossible in the case of Doris Day. She makes movies for a living and the studio demands that she devote her day to acting before the cameras, and a good part of her evenings to studying up on what she is supposed to do the next day. This means that during the shooting of a movie, she sometimes has to walk about the house in deep thought, or she has to go to her room and pore over her script far into the night.

The danger in this sort of a situation is that the husband might like a little attention and soon develop a snarling dislike for his wife's profession. Marty isn't even wise to that. He has the utmost respect for his wife's profession—and does everything in his power to see that she isn't disturbed. The experts say that if he wants another cup of coffee, he will more than likely snap his fingers and signal for the missus to bring it to him. Not Marty. He installed a restaurant-size coffee urn in his house and when he feels the need of a second or third cup, he goes and gets it. And if Doris' closest pal comes calling while she is upstairs, Marty smilingly tells them Doris is asleep, out of town, run away or anything else he can think of to spare his little lady from disturbance. He's not supposed to do it, you know. Maybe it's just that he loves the girl he's married to.

RECENTLY Doris and Marty attended an unusual seminar. It was an impromptu affair, held at the home of a friend, and the conversation got around to marriages in Hollywood. Suddenly someone noted with surprise that he had never read in any of the columns that Doris and Marty were tiffing or headed for a divorce. With people who have been wed more than a few weeks in the film capital this is a very unusual state of affairs. Generally the columnists find something to predict disaster over during the honeymoon. The Melchers were asked to explain. They couldn't account for it.

Well, we'll do it for them.

During all the time they have been together, even before they married, Doris and Marty have conducted themselves in a sane, orderly manner. Even, as some of the Hollywood folk would contend, in a stuffy manner. They seldom go to night clubs or large parties. Because of this they are seldom seen sitting at the wrong table with a man or a woman, nor can they be accused of paying too much attention to a handsome young stranger at a laughing and drinking spree.

They love their home and their life together so much that they make it the center of their existence. All their pleasures are at their finger tips, and neither of them feels the need to go out and seek strange diversions alone. They have the same interests. They like motoring, seeing new places when they have vacations, so they are kept away from the thorny paths the average stars tread in Manhattan and Paris, places where the columnists lurk.

They have a profound respect for one another. Marty honestly thinks Doris Day has the greatest ballad-singing voice of our time, and is one of the real charmers of the screen. She thinks he is the brightest man in business she has ever met—not just because of a loyalty to a husband—but because he has been successful and respected in his work.

They have, in common, a deep devotion to ideals of living and religion. They try their best to live according to these ideals and help each other at it every day. And they have a united desire to see Terry grow up, go to college and become a fine man. These things, along with their love, may be the reasons they can go against most of the rules of the book and make their marriage work.

In conclusion, we have one word of advice for the experts. If you are ever in Burbank, California, don't stop by the Melcher home. It will frustrate the heck out of you. Except, of course, if you're in the mood to get a good look at a pair who broke the rules to break the record for marital happiness.

Patti and Jerry exchanged a look.

"Chloe-ee! Chlo-ee!" Tony repeated.

A thin female voice answered from a distance. It was Janet's. "Here I am, darling," she called, "in the closet under the stairs."

"This is a new bit," Jerry muttered to his cute wife with the poodle cut. Both of them traced the sound of the voices and finally came upon Tony and Janet kissing in the closet.

"What's going on here?" Jerry demanded. "We're reorganizing the closets," Janet said.

"Some reorganizing," Mrs. Lewis cracked.

"What's with this Chloe routine?" Jerry asked.

Janet started to giggle. "We began yelling Chloe the first week we moved in here," she explained. "This place is so big we can get four people into the stall shower."

"Wanna try the shower?" Tony asked.

Lewis crossed his eyes, stuck out his tongue, raised his right foot. "You crazy, you! I took my shower last year."

Call it crazy, mad, foolish, gone. Call it what you will. But after living in a three-room apartment for almost two years, Tony and Janet are in heaven now that they've moved into their penthouse.

YOU'LL hear no more stories about the threat to their marriage or their alleged unhappiness, because in the opinion of Janet's mother, who should know, all these rumors stemmed directly from their old housing problem. The irritations caused by living in cramped quarters were magnified by friends and finally found their way into the gossip columns.

"Janet is an extremely orderly person," her mother explains. "She's worse than I am, and I'm a very fussy housekeeper. It actually disturbs her emotionally when things are thrown around."

"In their old place Tony and Janet had no room for books or his magic equipment or their cameras or anything. Janet used to keep her evening dresses at my house. That's a nuisance, you know, going over to your mother's house every time you want to put on a gown, and things like that got on Janet's nerves."

"Naturally enough, friends and newspaper people got wind of her occasional churlishness, and the next thing anyone knew they were writing stories about their incompatibility. Dad and I knew otherwise, but we decided the only way to stop all the gossip was to find the kids a larger home. We stumbled on this penthouse while the two of them were vacationing in New York. That was after they finished the Houdini picture."

Janet says her parents' industriousness really paid off. "Honestly," she points out, "when two people start living in real close quarters something can happen to their dispositions. Take Tony. He's got the sweetest disposition of any man I've ever known. Before we were married he was in the habit of puttering around with half-a-dozen different hobbies. He'd discovered that the one sure way for him to relax after work was to do something with his hands. He took up oil painting, building model planes, amateur photography."

"It's very hard to take a turn at each of these hobbies in a small apartment, and that's what we had after we were married. There just wasn't enough floor space, not even to set up his trains. Paints would drip from the easel onto the carpet. There wasn't even a private corner where he could sit down with a ship model. After a while it got a little discouraging, and he would bemoan his fate. But now that Mother and Daddy got us this penthouse—well, everything's perfect. No one can possibly get on anyone else's nerves."

Mr. and Mrs. Morrison had a pretty good idea of what rental their kids could afford before they went apartment shopping. Janet's father is her business manager, and Mrs. Morrison knows exactly what her daughter needs in the way of a kitchen, closets, cupboards, and so forth.

Oddly enough the Morrisons found a penthouse for rent in an apartment building one block away from where Janet and Tony used to live. Mrs. Morrison made the first inspection of the vacancy. She checked on things like the extra bath and the size of the kitchen cupboards. She made certain that there were two complete dressing rooms. She noted that there were facilities for doing laundry at home, and she fell in love with a spacious roof deck, quickly realizing that the terrace with built-in barbecue, plant boxes, and outdoor furniture offered all the advantages of a backyard without the headache of backyard maintenance.

Mr. Morrison handled the business end of the deal. He told the landlord that his daughter and son-in-law might be able to pay $400 a month but not a cent more, and he asked Mr. Haberman, the owner of the building, not to rent the penthouse until Tony and Janet returned from New York in a couple of days. An understanding man, Mr. Haberman said he'd hold it for a week.

THE morning the Santa Fé Chief pulled into Pasadena with Mr. and Mrs. Anthony Curtis aboard, both families were on the platform to meet them. The first words of greeting concerned the penthouse. Janet got so excited that she insisted upon seeing the place before dropping their luggage at the old address.

"Please don't count on it too much," Tony cautioned. "You're liable to be disappointed." Tony has lived through so many of Janet's high moments of anticipation that he knows when to apply the brakes to her unbridled enthusiasm. "I just can't stand to see the look of hurt on her face," he explains, "when she feels let down about something."

"Don't worry, Tony," Janet said, "I've got a feeling that this is our lucky day."

And it was.

Hand-in-hand they climbed the steep flight of stairs that was soon to become the private entrance to their private world. Just to be on the safe side, Janet kept her fingers crossed as they approached the threshold. In the manner of Cary Grant, whom he impersonates perfectly, Tony was acting very debonair, very nonchalant. Mr. Morrison fumbled with the keys for a moment. Then they all trooped in, Mama and Papa Schwartz, the Curtises, Tony's kid brother, the Morrisons.

"My first impression," Janet says, "when I walked into the living room was that this must be the whole apartment. I thought it was one of those chic, modern, one-room studio jobs with everything. My eyes swept over the fireplace grouping. They stopped for a minute on the baby grand piano and the two couches that are each eight feet long. I figured they must be beds. The card room or the game alcove—I mistook for the dinette.

"Tony was a lot sharper. He sensed that the place was exactly right from the start. And without even looking at any of the other rooms, he turned to Daddy and said, 'Okay, we'll take it.'"

In addition to a sensational living room, the penthouse boasts six other livable rooms that Tony and Janet have partly furnished.

The dining room is small but stylish. It is separated from the living room by a filmy drapery behind which Janet achieves the most unsuspected lighting effects. By candlelight the room becomes romantic. By using flush-lights Janet emphasizes the dramatic motif. By flooding the room with light from the ceiling's eggcrate fixture, she turns the room into a party setting.

TONY says the second largest room in the apartment—he's measured them all—is the master bedroom. Done in muted greens and rose, it's furnished with massive pieces of blonde furniture. In the comfortable expansiveness of the room, the scale and proportion of the furnishings is deceptive. Janet and Tony's king-size bed, for example, looks like an ordinary double bed, although it's much larger, and the normal-sized chaise longue gets lost in one corner.

Off the bedroom are the two dressing rooms lined with wardrobe closets. The closets are so beautifully organized that they delight Janet's orderly soul. A double-hung rod allows her to keep her blouses and skirts one above the other. Dresses and coats fit in two separate compartments. Handbags and hats are kept on deep shelves and her large collection of shoes hangs in shoe bags inside every closet door.

Tony's clothes are divided into groups. Sport shirts in one section, slacks and sport coats together in another, tailored suits in a third, and hobby clothes in a fourth. Tony's hobby clothes consist of everything imaginable from worn-out sneakers to old Navy tee-shirts.

The two most frequented places in the house are the den and the Tony Curtis Hobby Shop. They are really one large room divided by a partial partition which serves as shelf storage. The den side of the partition features a spinet piano, a wire-recorder, a soft couch, books, two chairs, and a telephone. Janet and Tony usually rehearse their lines in this room. It's also used for interviews and cozy little female conversations. On occasion it's been called the jive room, too. Let some of the hyper-talented friends gather, and quickly the room takes on the heated intimacy of a recording booth.

The far side of the partition is Tony's personal province, its decor and furnishings dependent upon his obsession at the moment. If he's casting clay masks, the room is cluttered with bags of plaster. If he's on the model plane kick, then balsa wood is strewn all about. No matter how her fingers itch to tidy up this room, Janet leaves it alone, but strictly. To date she has insisted upon only one wifely prerogative. Before Tony set up his paints and easel Janet made him tack down a piece of linoleum on the floor, so that he wouldn't ruin the carpet.

The apartment also boasts a house-size pantry and kitchen as well as a guest room and bath. "Technically we have a guest room," Tony explains, "but if we had to sleep a guest over, it'd be tough. The guest room is jammed with Janet's out-of-season clothes."

The Curtises supervise their menage very smoothly with the help of one housekeeper, Ida May. Idy, as she's fondly known, used to work for Janet's mother, but she's been with Janet ever since she and Tony tied the knot. She comes by the day, five days a week, and works from noon until the dinner dishes are finished. "Tony and Janet," she says, "suit each other fine. Janet is a very meticulous person, and Tony is very nice. All Janet has to do is leave me a note telling me what Tony wants to eat if she has to work late at the studio. That boy is an understanding husband. Just feed him, and he's fine."

ON New Year's Day Janet and Tony gave their first penthouse party. They had 15 people in to brunch and to watch the Rose Bowl Game on television. Naturally the girls in the party were much more interested in inspecting the apartment than watching football. Towards the shank of the afternoon one of the girls turned to Janet and said, "Why do you and Tony pay such a high rent for an apartment when you could get a house instead?"

Janet had some carefully thought-out answers. In the first place, she pointed out, if someone were to slice off the top floor of their building and put it on a lot, "You'd find that our apartment in size is the equivalent of a rather large house. This means we have space and privacy without the responsibility of owning property. When we start to raise a family, we don't want to be stuck with an old house. Also we're planning a trip to Europe in a few months, and we want to be free to lock the door and take off. You can't do that when you own a house. Someone has to look after the garden, the property, pay the taxes, and all of that. We've also decided that when the first baby comes along we'll buy a house and let it grow with us."

"Do you expect a baby in the near future?" someone asked Janet.

"I'm not pregnant if that's what you mean," Mrs. Curtis answered, "but I'm sure looking forward to it." And with that Tony held up three books on child care. "Used to be a Boy Scout," he explained. "Always believe in being prepared." END

now we have everything

Lucille told her obstetrician, Dr. Joe Harris, that she wanted her real-life baby to be born on the same day the baby in her TV script was supposed to come into the world.

"January 19th will be fine," Dr. Harris told her.

ONE day before, Desi drove Lucille down to the Cedars of Lebanon Hospital. Lucille says, "He drove well, but he was quite nervous. Every 30 seconds he kept turning to me and saying, 'How do you feel? How do you feel?' I felt better than he did."

"Who was nervous?" Desi asks in retrospect. "Not me. I was just maybe a little excited."

Lucille was checked into the hospital at 4:30 P.M. on a Sunday. Desi began smoking frantically . . . furiously.

"No use of you hanging around here," the doctor told him. "Nothing is going to happen until tomorrow."

Desi made certain that Lucille was comfortable. He smoked two packs of cigarettes in the process, then left her with one final admonition. "If you can possibly do it, darling, make it a boy."

Desi spent the night at the home of his mother, Mrs. Dolores Lolita Arnaz. By 6:30 the next morning he was back at the hospital, pacing the floors.

At 7:00 A.M. Lucille was wheeled into the delivery room. Dr. Harris gave her a spinal.

During the course of the delivery, Lucille asked a nurse, "Is it a boy?"

"We don't know yet," the nurse said. Lucille beamed when she was told she had given birth to a boy; so, too, did the doctors; the nurses clapped their hands.

Desi, his face flattened against a glass partition, saw the doctors and nurses laughing, and according to him, "I knew right away it was a boy. Honestly! I could tell from the expression on everyone's face."

The child was immediately named Desiderio Alberto Arnaz IV after his father, grandfather, and great grandfather, and weighed in at 8 lbs. 9 ounces.

Following the delivery, Lucille was wheeled down the hall and Desi was permitted in her private room for five minutes. "I don't know what I told her," he confesses. "I was so happy. I just kissed her and I know I said thank you and I love you and I know she said I love you and thank you, Desi, and something else. But who can remember at a time like that?"

After his five-minute visit with Lucy, 84 Desi raced down the hospital corridors shouting, "It's a boy. It's a boy. Now we have everything. Now we have everything."

Mrs. Desiree Ball, Lucille's mother, and Desi's mother, were waiting in the anteroom, and they heard Desi before they saw him. Mrs. Arnaz came over and hugged Mrs. Ball, whose broken leg was in a cast, the result of having fallen out of an auto.

That afternoon the family saw the baby, and Lucille's mother said, "He has a pug-nose just like Lucy." Desi's mother said, "He looks just like Desi, even his black hair."

Desi says the baby will be shown on one television program when he gets a little older, and after that he'll be retired to the Arnaz nursery for the next two years.

Friends of Lucille say that she always wanted two children and now that she has both a son and daughter will probably have no more offspring. "Desi says we have everything," she claims, "and I guess he's right."

TO Lucille Ball, her children, her career, her money, her fame are all important but first and foremost in her book of values comes the success of her marriage to Desi.

Lucille once lost Desi—they both know what life is like without each other—and they don't particularly care to re-live the experience.

Ten years ago, Lucy and Desi had a dilly of a fight. It concerned a couple who were staying out at the Arnaz ranch. The fight reached the danger point, and Lucille insisted that she had had enough. She was going to file for a divorce.

In white heat, Desi said that was okay with him. He was going into the Army, and he'd just as soon not have a wife to worry about. He was inducted into the service, and Lucille went ahead with the divorce proceedings.

When his basic training was finished, Desi came back to Los Angeles on his first leave and immediately phoned Lucille. She asked him to come out to the ranch.

"It was wonderful," Desi recalls. "We looked at each other. We knew that we were still very much in love, and we decided to forget our quarrel and live in peace."

Legally and technically, Desi and Lucille were still man and wife, so Desi spent the night at the ranch.

When he awoke at nine the next morning, he was surprised to find Lucille fully and beautifully clothed. "Where you going this time of morning?" he asked groggily.

"To get our divorce," Lucille said. Desi shook the sleep out of his eyes. "Did you say divorce?" he asked.

"Yes, divorce." "But I thought you agreed everything was fine?" he insisted. "You said last night that we'd never again separate."

"Now, look," Lucille explained. "I filed for divorce two months ago. The case is set for ten o'clock this morning. The judge is going to be there. The lawyer is going to be there. The reporters are going to be there, and I'm simply not going to disappoint that many people."

Oddly enough, Lucille drove down to court and asked the judge for a divorce on grounds of mental cruelty. It was granted very quickly, whereupon she thanked everyone and drove back to the ranch. Here she cooked breakfast for Desi and when he woke up for the second time, served it to him. Then they kissed—and, well, it was almost like a second honeymoon.

All divorce decrees in California are interlocutory decrees. It takes one year before they become final. In the case of Desi and Lucy, they were living together as man and wife even while the divorce was granted, so that it never really took effect.

Just to make sure that everything was legal and above board, the lovers were re-married a few years ago by a Catholic priest. Lucille is not Catholic but Desi is, so, of course, both of their children are being raised in the Catholic faith.

Ever since that incident, Desi and Lucille have never used the word "divorce."

Both of them are stubborn and highly-opinionated and argue a good deal, especially for a pair of love-birds, but the quarrel usually ends up with a long tempestuous kiss and as Desi says, "with Lucy being right."

BEFORE Desi dreamed up the fantastically successful TV program of I Love Lucy, he used to move out of the house "each time we had a hassel." He'd pack his clothes, throw the luggage into his car, drive 22 miles into town and check in at the Hollywood Athletic Club. A day later he'd phone Lucy and that night he'd be back.

"Finally," he says, "I said to myself, 'This is crazy, this moving out everytime you have a fight. It costs too much money.' So I got hold of a carpenter and together we built what I call our rumpus-house. It's right on our property and has everything, dining room, bath, study, kitchen. Now when Lucy and I have a quarrel, I don't have to drive into town. I just move into the rumpus-house. Only a funny thing, now that I have some place nearby to go, we don't seem to have so many serious quarrels. Just friendly little arguments. We're really too busy to fight."

I Love Lucy is not only the most successful television program in the country, but its by-products are becoming big business. There's an I Love Lucy comic strip, Lucy and Desi dolls, and undoubtedly a flock of Lucy fashions to come in pajamas, dresses, hats, and other clothes items.

Desi and Lucille have been married for 12 years, during the first ten of which the comedienne says, "We tried our darndest to have some children. Just when we were reconciled to a childless marriage, bingo—two in a row."

"That's show business for you," shrugs fatalistic Desi.

Lucille Ball tosses her mate an understanding grin. "Desi's so excited about being the father of a son," she explains, "that he sometimes gets nature mixed up with show business." END

At this point, Mike's sense of humor proved to be an excellent prenatal influence. It's doubtful whether his young wife, who was still a few weeks away from her 21st birthday, had ever enjoyed a more hearty laugh in her whole lifetime than over his straight-faced comment, slightly distorted now, but the same in essence, that still echoes in the conversation of friends. "We have a nerve!" one remembers he exclaimed. "Two unemployed actors undertaking parenthood."

Funny? Yes, but all humor is based on truth. Despite the fact that a new five-year contract had been negotiated for Liz, raising her salary from the neighborhood of $1,500 to $3,000 a week, she was on suspension. Not because studio bosses are cruelly oblivious to motherhood, it's just that, much as they would like to have made her a present of her regular salary until she was able to work again, Hollywood now operates under more stringent rules than in the past.

As for Mike Wilding, let it be recorded that he is no different from other expectant fathers. He did not relish being unemployed at the time of the baby's arrival. But if prenatal influence is not a lot of pure nonsense, young Michael Howard Wilding should be a lad of sturdy character, for his father had been heard to utter a firm "no" to an important part with Lana Turner in Latin Lovers, although he had recently signed a contract with Metro which nets him in the neighborhood of $1,000 a week. "It's not that the role isn't good," he said, "it just isn't good for me."

No one, least of all Elizabeth or Mike Wilding, expects any sympathy.

Their combined income should make them better off than at least 95% of all other salaried employees in the nation. But they certainly are not rich and probably never will be. Their son wasn't born with a silver spoon in his mouth, but he did have a gold one by his bedside. It came as a gift from Danish silversmith Philip Paval. It matches exactly the one given by him to Queen Elizabeth at the birth of Prince Charles.

But whatever their financial rating, they maintained a fine average of parental behavior the last few hours before Michael H. Wilding, Jr.'s arrival. A last minute check of Elizabeth's condition convinced the doctor that she should have additional X-rays. These were made the day before the baby's birth and as gently as possible Liz was told that it would be best for the child if she went to the hospital the next day for a Caesarean delivery.

You have the word of friends that this was a disappointment Elizabeth found hard to take, but in a situation like this, events move too swiftly for any lingering regrets. They were at Santa Monica Hospital before she could think of much more to say about it to Mike, other than, "Well at least you won't have to pace the floor for hours, waiting."

That's what she thought! Mike followed her to their two-room suite, in a complete daze. They hardly had time for a couple of fervent "I love you's," when crisp, efficient nurses ordered him out of the room. To Mike it seemed like seconds later that she was wheeled out, a still form in white from head to foot, her hair completely done up in white cloth and knotted in bunny rabbit fashion. Only her eyes seemed alive as she stared up at him and whispered in assurance, "They say it will take only 15 minutes."

Only 15 minutes! Mike returned to the room where her mother was sitting, quietly reading a religious science book. He sat down to wait for those only 15 minutes to pass, and by the time his watch showed an elapsed 30 minutes, he had very little sanity left. Amusing? Such situations never are to expectant fathers. At exactly 39 minutes and 30 seconds, Mike was certain that something must have gone wrong. He started for the door.

Mercifully, a young interne appeared on the scene to steady him.

"Congratulations, Mr. Wilding. You are the father of a fine baby boy!"

"Yes! Yes! But is my wife all right?"

The interne ignored the question. "Yes sir, a fine baby boy. Now, if you'll excuse me..." And the interne was gone.

Mike went back to his chair and took a long pull at the small bottle of scotch tucked into his topcoat by an understanding male who had been through things like this before.

If hospital attendants are correct, the first thing Mike said to Elizabeth when she had conquered her drowsiness long enough to comprehend, were the exultant words, "I saw him!"

To which they say she replied with a smile, "That's nothing. I saw him when he was five seconds old."

And indeed she had. It seems that drugs do not take a normal effect on Liz. People who know her best say that nothing less than a tap on the head with a baseball bat will put her completely under. Thus, she was more than ordinarily aware of what was going on, and watched as much of the proceedings as she possibly could under the circumstances. About one thing she was disappointed, however. Her ears were stuffed with cotton and she couldn't hear Michael's first baby cry of protest as he was patted on the po-po.

In the days that have followed, a great change seems to have come over Mrs. Mike Wilding, young mother, as compared to Elizabeth Taylor, the darling of MGM. Whereas in months and years past there has been some justified comment to the effect that a degree of selfishness was one of Liz's traits, that is all gone. Her two Michaels are her entire world, and beyond that she looks forward in two years, or perhaps less, to another child.

After this stout assertion of further ambitions in the career of motherhood, a friend told her, "That's all very well, but with only two bedrooms, the playroom and the maid's quarters, how will you manage in this house?"

"That's simple," Liz replied. "We have plenty of room to build on another wing."

Studio bosses may hope that Liz will temper her ambitions somewhat in this direction. By this time she should be working in the picture, The Brothers Were Valiant, her long-postponed film with Stewart Granger and Bob Taylor. Friends, however, are delighted.

"I have never seen such a change in any woman," declared one of her business managers. "She is not as conscious of herself as she was. She seems suddenly to have become completely adult. I think it will make her a much finer actress, but people won't be able to persuade her to do things as easily as they have in the past. In my opinion, she is the greatest personality we have on the screen today, but now it's the studio's responsibility to see that she has pictures that are worthy of her talents."

Commenting on Mike, this same astute agent, who insists on keeping his name a secret, says, "He is a sensitive actor who always claims he hates the acting profession. I don't think he has quite found himself, but I'm convinced that he will one day, very soon, perhaps as a writer-director."

In the midst of all this conjecture, the Wildings are intently occupied behind the closed and locked gates of their new home, so well hidden from the road that even with one of those movie stars homes maps that can be purchased along Sunset Boulevard, no one may peer inside. Mike has said, "With my memory I'd have a difficult time finding my own house, but the number 1771 reads the same forward and backwards, so I can't miss."

"Also," he added, "the sign reading 'Beware Of The Dog' means just exactly that." Aside from the "watch" variety, there is Gi-Gi, the poodle, a recent mother of two, and a dachshund who can hear a twig snap at two blocks away.

THIS near barbed-wire set-up is not motivated by snobbishness or anti-social feelings on the part of either Michael or Liz. It is a purely practical measure brought about in part by some pretty unpleasant experiences before and just after the birth of their son.

Liz, from childhood, has known how to work with the press. She understands the importance of publicity, and has always cooperated beautifully with the people who get the news. It was sometimes a great strain... as in those frantic days when a horde of reporters haunted her to learn the truth about her pending divorce from Nicky Hilton... and the subsequent wild scramble for intimate news of her sudden marriage in England to personable Mike Wilding. But even publicity-wise Elizabeth Taylor could not conceive of the pitch the news-fever would rise to in the effort to be the first to break the story of Liz and her baby, complete with pictures. (The contest was more frenzied than usual because of resentment felt by other publications when MODERN SCREEN scooped the field to publish an exclusive set of pictures of Jane Powell's adorable Suzanne several months ago.)

So the fantastic story of Elizabeth's nightmare began. At this point no one could blame her if she believed that all members of the press are pathological in their pursuance of a "Scoop."

For instance, one reporter talked a friend of his into going up to the Summit Drive home of Liz and Mike, disguised as a gardener. The idea was that the young man would watch his chance, slip into the house and snap a picture. This sort of thing, as anyone can imagine, is liable to result in someone winding up in jail. Fortunately, the young man was unable to penetrate the Wilding house, and had to report back a failure.

In the meantime, dozens of photographic news services, reporters and editors hammered away at the problem. They called Mike Wilding by long distance phone until Mike was ready to pull the offending instrument out by the roots. They contacted Elizabeth's friends, trying to convince them to steal a picture of the baby. They even covered all of the camera shops in Beverly Hills, trying to find the place at which Mike had taken his snapshots to be developed, just in case there might be a loose stray negative.

What has happened up until now, ridiculous as it may seem, has resulted in a heavy veil of censorship, behind which Elizabeth has been forced to retire, temporarily, in Garbo-like silence. And a wall has been built around the love of the Wildings, figuratively and literally.

INSIDE that wall of an evening Liz and Mike curl up together in the living room on a huge lavender couch. Liz, more than likely wearing her gift from Mike. After the baby was born he presented her with a beautiful strand of pearls, interwoven in a golden rope. Naturally, enough, it's her favorite and rarely leaves her lovely throat these days. The Scotch nurse, who may soon be leaving because Liz has expressed a desire to go it alone with little Michael when he's a trifle older, brings the baby in for big Mike to burp. He doesn't quite have the hang of it yet, and more often than not Liz has to take over.

Then silence falls over the house. Mr. and Mrs. Wilding may watch a favorite television program for a while, but when an English picture comes on with Mike in it, he gets up and switches it off in spite of her protests, for as he has put it on more than one occasion, "Ordinarily I'm a reasonable enough fellow, but I don't care for my acting."

If you could be there then in the early evening, with Liz and Mike as they look out over the city far out to the light of ships at sea, you would realize that is one time at least they should be left alone together, for they are just beginning to build the stuff of which precious memories are made.

You could chuckle with them as they recall the early visitor who looked at the baby and exclaimed, "How beautiful—what a perfectly shaped head—why he looks exactly like a human being."

Or you could hear Father Wilding say, "I don't know when I'll get used to it. Every time I call him Michael, I feel like I'm talking to myself!"

You probably have seen the newspaper pictures, if they have been released by this time, and noticed the same thing their friends have—that the baby has his mother's eyes and nose; his father's mouth and facial characteristics. He smiles the same way his dad does, as though secretly amused by something.

Perhaps that's because he knows, even at this early age, that his mother has a considerable sense of humor. For when Michael was only two weeks old, someone commented that his full head of hair closely resembled his dad's. Liz, her eyes twinkling, glanced at Mike's fast receding hairline as she exclaimed, "Oh a lot of babies have a good head of hair just after they are born. But don't worry, he'll lose it soon enough—just like his father!"

But Mike, Sr., didn't lose one hair over the traditional poser asked new fathers: "Whom do you think she loves more—you or the baby?" Mike had the answer in a second, and it should become a classic: "All I know is that Liz never lets me out of her sight and I will never let her out of mine!"

Denise Darcel, who looked good enough to eat herself, in a dark suit with white accent and chapeau, had a constantly changing series of admiring male luncheon partners. Deborah Kerr, drifting back and forth in a wispy black and white dotted dress, looked lovely, as did Mala Powers. Other guests who gaily chatted with Denise and Deborah included Charlton Heston, Joan Caulfield, Marilyn Maxwell, Janet Leigh, Leslie Caron, Mr. and Mrs. Barry Sullivan, Phyllis Kirk and Elaine Stewart.

The judges' table looked like a page from MODERN SCREEN's popularity poll!

Seated at it were Fernando Lamas, June Allyson, Shelley Winters, Dick Powell, Dana Andrews, Pamela Mason, Deborah Kerr, Anne Baxter, Joan Evans, and special guests Radio Commentator Michael Silver and famous sculptor, Nison Tregor.

Esther Williams, who'd been chosen as this year's M. S. fashion commentator, started the showing after lunch. The celebrities and other guests settled down into their chairs, and the show was on!

Hollywood's top models paraded the newest Spring styles in gaily colored cotton dresses, cute little hats, and smart Spring shoes. They twirled adorable umbrellas, useful for both rain and shine, as they passed in review. Each member of the board of judges, pencil and paper in hand, jotted down his selections for the prize-winning styles. Afterwards, the decisions of the judges were announced. Then the stars donned the winning styles and were photographed for MODERN SCREEN's star-studded fashion pages.

As the exciting afternoon drew to a close, the stars were led to a corner of the terrace, for the "grab-bag" contest. Lining up, each star selected a present from the pile of prettily wrapped Easter gifts. June Allyson was first up, and was the lucky winner of a piece of Samsonite luggage. Other gifts were Dana 20 Carats perfume and cologne, more Samsonite luggage, Encore cigarettes, Lubar's gay and smart umbrellas, Elgin compacts, Ledo's exquisite rhinestone jewelry, Lennox of St. Louis handbags, Brown Derby cakes, Paper-Mate pens stamped with "MODERN SCREEN Fashion Party," personalized Paper-Mate desk sets stamped with stars' names, men's bow-ties (see Dana Andrews, page 51), Hicproof nylon hosiery, Luxite nylon tricot petticoats, Ah-Footsie denim and terrycloth playshoes with lush foam rubber soles, and Rose Marie Reid dolls with gift certificates for bathing suits. END

MODERN SCREEN wants to thank these stars for taking time out from their busy lives: Nison Tregor, outstanding sculptor of the age. He has sculpted President Dwight D. Eisenhower and will fly to England soon to do Queen Elizabeth II and Winston Churchill. Pamela Mason (Mrs. James Mason): playwright and writer under the name Pamela Kellino, hostess of MODERN SCREEN's fashion party.

hollywood's newest sex queen

(Continued from page 49) Peter-Pannish paddock girl job in The Return Of October with Glenn Ford and after that romped with a blown-up gorilla in Mighty Joe Young to become the Saturday morning heroine of the bikeland set. And that's how almost everyone around town still sized up Terry as an actress—just another juvenile.

But they don't any more. They sure don't. And the person who switched all this stymied thinking to more constructive channels—high time, too—is nobody but Terry Moore herself.

ABOUT a year ago, Terry added up her Hollywood prospects and the answer came dangerously close to zero. She had a contract at Columbia but it had dribbled along with only five pictures in five years and option time was approaching. Terry had a hunch her option wouldn't be lifted and she wasn't sure she wanted it lifted, either. So, getting an idea, she picked up her telephone and called Paul Nathan, producer Hal Wallis' casting director. "I'm Terry Moore," she told him. "I want to play Marie Buckholder in Come Back, Little Sheba. Please—will you see me?"

"Why not?" he came back. "I've seen about everyone else"—which was the truest of talk. Already, about every busty belle and curvaceous cutie in Hollywood had been considered for the part—including Marilyn Monroe. And they'd all been put back in the cheesecake box, including Marilyn.

Terry Moore slipped on her "lucky outfit"—a royal blue sweater and a royal blue skirt, and looking like what she was meant to be—a college co-ed—gunned her Chevy over to Paramount. Inside, she read a scene, and in a fast triple play from Nathan to Director Danny Mann to Wallis, she got the part.

If you've seen Terry Moore's sex-loaded scenes with Richard Jaeckel in Come Back, Little Sheba, you'll know what the shout-ing's all about. But if you haven't or until you do, well—

One producer came out of the preview shaking his head unbelievably. "I thought Hollywood had done everything there was to do with sex," he marvelled, "but I was wrong. This is new—and the best yet. It's sex with a fresh scrubbed look!"

Another hungry critic who has seen them all come and go promptly offered to eat his typewriter. "If the scenes between Dick Jaeckel and Terry Moore aren't the sexiest since Garbo and Gilbert."

But a fan, maybe, said it with the most powerful prose. "Terry," he wrote, "you sure put the 'she' in 'Sheba'!"

But while all of this—not only the new deal in Hollywood sex appeal, but the fact that Terry Moore can act—is a surprise to everyone else, to Terry the only amazing thing is that it took so long. This is her third Hollywood "discovery" over a stretch of 13 years. Twice before she's watched great expectations fizzle out for one reason or another. This time, she's making sure they stick.

EVEN before the Sheba results got around Hollywood, Terry took typical Moore measures to keep her luck warmed up. One hot August day last summer she raced to the San Diego airport, grabbed the controls of a rented plane and pointed it north toward Hollywood. She was after another job.

Minutes before, her agent had called her at La Jolla, where she was playing summer stock. He told her that Director Elia Kazan would see her that day about a part in his next picture—that is, if she could make it by four o'clock. Could she? It was past noon then. She had a performance that night. Terry didn't think twice. "Sure," she said.

It was after three when she swooped down on Clover Field, yelled, "Keep it warm!" to the gasser and roared away with the waiting agent. She wore pedal pushers, a T-shirt and tennis sneakers.

Minutes later, she stood disheveled and breathless, before the man with whom every star in Hollywood yearns to make a picture. Terry had never met Kazan before. On her way in she'd run a gauntlet of hopefully waiting starlets, gussied up to the eyebrows. The great director surveyed the touseled apparition, a little puzzled. He was hunting a sexy girl, too.

"Well," he finally observed, "who are you and what can you do?"

"I'm Terry Moore," she told "Gadge" Kazan. "I can fly a plane, and I can break wild horses. I can act, too and I can also be very mean."

"Wonderful!" Kazan grinned. "I'm sick of 'glamor' girls. Come right this way." A little later, Terry walked out with the prize part of The Man On The Tightrope, which she recently made in Germany. And in which, they say, she steams up an icy Alpine stream in a flesh-colored bathing-suit love scene with Cameron Mitchell, the like of which has never been seen.

After that, Kazan called Terry "a female Marlon Brando" (his highest praise) and Twentieth Century-Fox signed her to a long term contract—but only after some pretty spirited bidding. Five other studios wanted Terry, too. Everyone agrees that it couldn't happen to a nicer girl. Only it's not entirely correct to say it happened. Terry Moore made it happen, which is the way she's been operating ever since she was born Helen Luella Koford at the Methodist Hospital in Los Angeles, Jan. 7, 1930.

WHILE Terry herself is a typically California product, her dad, Lamar Koford, is half Swede and half Dane, and her mother, the former Luella Bickmore, is half Danish and half Scotch. That makes Terry three-fourths Scandinavian by blood, which you can spot right away in her slightly tilted eyes that are the green-blue of a glacial lake and in her skin, as smooth and soft as a snowbank. The Scotch in Terry comes out with thick coal black eyebrows that still have to be plucked daily and equally ebon lashes. Both Viking boldness and canny Highlander persistence have cropped out in Terry all her life.

Once, when she was four, in suburban

Glendale where she grew up, her mother took her to the doctor's for a whooping cough shot. She turned to talk to the nurse and when she looked around her daughter was outside the window teetering on a ledge ten stories above the pavement. "Wait," hissed the nurse, "we can't scare her." She sidled over to the window and asked, "Is there anything interesting down there?" Then, as the intrepid toddler peered to see if there was, she grabbed her.

Another time, on a family visit to the Griffith Park Zoo, they paused before the lion cage just as the attendant came along with the afternoon horsemeat. When he opened the gates, Helen shot in after him, enchanted with the roars. He snatched her away from the beasts, but when he turned to go back Helen was on his heels again. This time they hustled her out of the zoo.

The trouble was that Terry was endowed with the natural curiosity of a kitten, the spunk of a terrier and the legs of a jack-rabbit—a dangerous combination for any kid. On top of that, she was an unreconstructed tomboy, who scorned sissy diversions until, in fact, just recently. Now she's collecting dolls, "Making up," as Terry grins, "for my misspent childhood."

But what Helen Koford liked back then was action. The boys' gangs she raced with on the block called her "Cottontail" and "Doe" because she could scoot so fast. "I was the best dirt clod fighter for my weight and age on our block," Terry boasts. "I could bean a kid and then get the heck out of there." Speed, in fact, became a fetish which Terry still thrills to as she streaks through the air at the controls of a plane.

Up in Downey, Idaho, where Helen spent summer vacations with her aunts and uncles, a neighboring ranch trained racehorses and, naturally, that's where she sneaked whenever she could, climbing over the fence and breezing the thoroughbreds at full gallop up and down the track until she got caught. Her own relatives' farm raised minks and silver foxes and it was there that Helen acquired a fierce love for all kinds of critters. She still picks up dead birds and buries them in her backyard with little crosses, loves everything that flies, hops, gallops or pads and had a wonderful time making Mighty Joe Young even though a frenzied horse almost trampled her. The same goes for her recent circus picture, The Man On The Tightrope where a jumbo elephant pussyfooted up behind Terry and almost squashed her to grease before the German lion tamer snatched her to safety. As a matter of fact, Terry loves animals so much that until recently she kept a pet constrictor named "Midnight," which she picked up in Florida. She missed him so much when she flew to Germany last year that she had him flown over—but, conditioned to sea-level, the snake coiled up and died.

IN the face of all the above, it is not only remarkable that Helen Koford grew up to be the leading exponent of a new sex appeal in Hollywood. As her mother says it's remarkable enough that she ever grew up. But as any parent knows such kids lead a charmed life. They also know that often the most hopeless tomboy turns into the most luscious lovely.

There was another factor which served to keep Miss Helen Koford from growing up and joining the Marines. She loved to perform. Blessed with a native imagination of a Scheherezade, and the mimicry of a chimpanzee, Helen Luella was lured into frocks and frills with the promise that she could recite. It's true that at first her subjects ran to cop-car sirens, machine guns, etc., and once at three her mother caught her taping potholders on her shoulders after a look at the U.S.C. football squad in the newspaper. But gradually she was channeled into a more ladylike repertoire and at four she made her first hit.

That was on a Mother's Day program at the Mormon Church when she recited "Somebody's Mother" and—even though it was church—the congregation rose up and clapped. From then on Helen was reading and memorizing everything she could find (she could read before she went to kindergarten) even writing her own skits.

Neighbors used to call her mother up. "Can I borrow Helen this afternoon?" they'd ask. "We're having company," Helen was always pleased to oblige. At school teachers trotted into her room whispered to her teacher and crooked a finger. Some emergency had arisen but Helen would keep the kids quiet. She filled in at assemblies, at about every kind of Glendale clambake. "There used to be a saying among the kids at school," recalls Terry, "in case of fire, call Koford!"

But it was all good experience, just how good is attested by the fact that—even though some say she's ripe for an Academy Award today—Terry Moore has yet to have a drama lesson.

By the time she was ten and in fifth grade, Mrs. Koford's tilt-nosed, blonde daughter was as well known as the mayor of Glendale and twice as popular. And, as invariably happens with fireball kiddies so close to Hollywood, what her mother got was, "That girl ought to be in the movies." Thrilling words to most girls, but Helen didn't seem at all impressed.

It took an interested neighbor to sic Helen on a Hollywood career, or rather to sic it on Helen. What this lady, Ann Jensen, did was to have a photograph taken of Helen and then, unknown to the Kofords, pay $10 to have it printed in a Hollywood casting directory along with Helen's name and phone number. The results were quick, surprising, but also mighty embarrassing.

The week the book was published, Twentieth Century-Fox called Mrs. K. "Do you have a little blonde girl named Helen Koford—and can she ride a horse?" they asked. That did it for Helen—the horse. She didn't take any chances on missing the fun. "I was wearing braces on my teeth then," she remembers, "and I knew that would ruin everything. I went to the orthodontist and had them taken off. Well, the very first thing they said was, 'This girl wears braces on her teeth.' So I had to have them all cemented on again. I spent my paycheck before I even got it." But her screen debut was even sadder.

The picture was Maryland, a race horse epic. Helen rode her horse, all right, and loved it, for four days at $25 a day. At school she spread the exciting news of her impending triumph. Finally along with her girl friends she saw Maryland. She wasn't in it. Instead she was in disgrace. "What a liar!" scoffed one girl. "I'll bet you made it all up. You never were in the movies."

"Maybe you were," said another. "But you were so punk they had to cut you out."

The sting of that smack-down, however, was soothed somewhat by child parts in three fine movies which rescued Helen's reputation: Gaslight, The Howards Of Virginia, and My Gal Sal. Other exciting things also happened to Helen Luella Koford, including two careers she hadn't even thought about: One, in Hollywood radio, and another as America's magazine cover queen. In fact, about seven years ago, unless you were deaf or blind, it was hard to miss Helen Koford over the air or on the newsstands.

SHE started radio right at the bottom—acting in commercials. But when Helen did commercials the audience applauded. Soon she was one of the three girls who carried almost the entire child acting load at the Hollywood ether studios—a fixture on coast-to-coast shows like Mayor Of The Town, the Bob Burns Show, Big Town, A Date With Judy to name a few. Then one day Tom Kelley, a commercial photographer, took a couple of pictures. He sent them East tucked in a package of others. What he got back from his agent was an excited wire: "This Koford kid is loaded with personality. Sold the two for covers. Can sell all you send." But Kelley was busy and didn't follow through. He told Helen about it though. She's not a gal to let anything cool down.

Driving through Hollywood next day on her way to a radio show she spotted a sign, "John Randolph, Commercial Photographer." Helen walked right in and kept walking in every week for the next two years. During that time Randolph photographed nobody but her. As a result Helen landed on the cover of about every big time magazine. Outside of Linda Christian she had no cover girl rival. She made 40 odd, more than any other girl in the U.S.A.

What Helen Koford revealed in those cover girl days is exactly what Terry Moore is still proving today—that fresh, young sex can be something besides canyons of cleavage and bikini shorts. In every cover, ad, or artist's portrait Helen Koford posed for she was "fresh-scrubbed and clean cut." She beamed a smile like morning sunshine. She posed with water dripping off her face, snow in her hair, sunlight, wind and rain on her cheeks. She posed on horses, with dogs, in a pool, playing tennis, on skis. She looked like somebody's daughter, some boy's girl, the sweet kid next door. She still does—but oh, what a kid!

Strangely enough, it wasn't this feminine charm that put Helen back in the Hollywood running for the second time, after she'd framed her high school diploma. On the contrary—following a brief contract with Eagle-Lion which did little for Helen except change her name to Jan Ford—she was grabbed by Columbia for The Return Of October to make her biggest hit so far playing—that's right—a tomboy.

Helen, or Jan, was such a convincing tomboy, though, that everyone said, "Why, you are Terry," (the character's name) and so for the second time Helen Koford rechristened herself. The "Moore" comes from the last half of her mother's maiden name, Bickmore. She's kind of sorry she's stuck with it now, though. "Terry" sounds like such a bobby-soxer, and after all, she's pretty thoroughly grown up.

For a while it looked as if her screen career was off to the races at last. Terry toured 22 cities, with the picture, came, saw and conquered. Newspapers proclaimed: "A new star is born!" They called her "The girl with the champagne personality," made her a Kentucky Colonel—all kinds of things. But back in Hollywood all that was soon forgotten. One part a year was the best Terry could do. The string of so-so pictures—Gambling House, He's A Cockeyed Wonder, Sunny Side Of the Street, Barefoot Mailman—kept her talent under wraps—especially since her contract vetoed both radio and magazine covers. For a mile-a-minute girl like Terry it was a pretty painful period.

"I almost went crazy," she says. To keep sane she took UCLA extension courses, and now has two years' college credits on a psychology major, plans to wind up a PhD. There was also plenty of time for a social whirl. Terry Moore has scads of friends.

Elizabeth Taylor, Ann Blyth, Jane Powell, Diana Lynn—all of these and dozens more, Terry has chummed with since her early teens. Besides football captains, she dated young movie actors such as Jerome Courtland, Darryl Hickman, Dick Long, Craig Hill, Roddy MacDowell. She and Roddy were double dating with Liz and Glenn Davis the night that romantic West Point athlete first asked Terry for a date.

ALOT of people have concluded that Terry Moore captured the famous "Mister Outside" on his rebound from Liz Taylor—but that's not quite the way it happened. True, that night was the last night Glenn ever took Elizabeth out, but Terry still figured he was her girl friend's private property. So she said "No" and kept saying it when Glenn called her during the next few weeks. When he went back to West Point to coach he wrote her letters. She didn't answer them. In fact, it was a good year and a half later before Glenn called again and she gave him a date. By that time Liz had already been engaged again to Bill Pawley and had said "Yes" to Nicky Hilton. So Terry's conscience was clear, even if her spinning head wasn't.

It was a fast-breaking courtship with football's speed merchant once it got going. That first date was New Year's night for the Los Angeles Times' Annual Sports Award dinner. Everybody who's done anything in the world of sports is honored then, and Terry—a great sports fan—got dizzy watching the muscled celebrities. Then Glenn took her to the Rose Bowl game in Pasadena, but she can't even remember who played. After that came a junket to Chicago for a charity TV Marathon, and Glenn was there, too. Next, invited to Honolulu for an All-Star basketball exhibition with the Globetrotters. Davis wrangled plane tickets for Terry and her mother—and that did it.

What the tropical moon, swaying palms, throbbing guitars and hula girls didn't do, the columnists and Terry's friends did.

All raved, "Glenn and you make a perfect pair." "It just kind of snowballed," Terry says today. "I guess Glenn caught me in the end of my football era." Anyway, in those five days they became engaged and were married in the Glendale Mormon church February 9, 1952. After a flying honeymoon to Panama, Acapulco and Guatemala they drove to Texas, where Glenn entered the oil business. Two months later, on April 14, Terry sued for divorce on the familiar grounds of "mental cruelty."

The only way to explain an alliance that short lived is that it must have all been a mistake. Terry doesn't deny this. She has a hunch it was infatuation rather than love and she's frank in admitting that maybe she wasn't ready to be a wife, certainly not Glenn's wife. There are few nicer fellows than Glenn Davis, but at heart he's an old-fashioned boy who obviously expected his bride to sit around the house and be just plain Mrs. Davis. Terry can't sit around anywhere. In the one-room apartment where they started house-keeping, she found it stifling to talk recipes and things with the other wives while Glenn went duck hunting with the boys. "I wanted to go duck hunting with the boys, too," admits Terry.

When her studio called her back to test for a picture (that was never made), Hollywood looked like heaven to her. "I'm not the type for Texas," she wrote Glenn and it was all amicably called off. The divorce, final this April, is the first in her family and Terry's not proud of it at all. But she isn't the kind to cry over spilt milk, either, or to sit around wringing her hands. She got back into circulation pronto.

Today the stag line forms to the right: Hugh O'Brien, Nels Larsen, Mel Rives, a Korean war jet hero—there goes that list again! Of them all, perhaps Terry's most simpatico with Lawrence Harvey, a brilliant young British actor brought to Hollywood for The Robe. They're having lots of fun party and pub crawling, but she's not trying on any rings even for size. "I'm afraid I don't fall in love with men," says Moore, a little helplessly, "I fall in love with their talent." At various times, she admits she's tumbled hard for the great gifts of people like Danny Thomas, Mickey Rooney, Johnny Ray, Elia Kazan, John Huston—yes—and Glenn Davis. Maybe that best explains the why of their marriage—and its break-up. "Someday though," believes Terry, "it will be different and then it's for keeps and for kids, two of them—one of each kind."

RIGHT now Terry's young life is crowded with other diverse and exciting activities besides her hi-balling career. She's learning German and Spanish. She's still chasing her college degree. She's collecting dolls and stuffed animals from all over the world. She's flying planes—still rented ones, although she's saving up for a Cessna 140. Terry has her pilot's license and 170 hours and is out for a two-engine certificate next. Sometimes, when the traffic's heavy, she hires a job at Clover Field, and wings home.

That home is still in Glendale, the same attractive cottage where Terry grew up, glamorized only by Terry's redecorated bedroom, her dolls, some Dresden figurines she brought back from Germany, and the chronic bouquets of posies from beaux. Neither her dad, a credit investigator, her mother, or brother, Wally, are impressed with their famous girl by now—it's really an old story with the Kofords, although they're happy, of course, to see things breaking Terry's way at last. Her dad handles her money, because Terry is the kind who is likely to give anyone who asks her two tens for a five.

Terry doesn't get pampered at home, but she's not the kind who needs it. In Bavaria last fall Terry stayed in a pension with 40 people to one bathroom and spent one entire wintry day in that icy mountain stream with nothing on her but that flesh-colored swim suit. She got certain parts of her anatomy numbed by the cold but no complaints. Actually she's been fairly lucky, considering her Fearless Fagan existence since birth, to come off with nothing worse than a cracked shin skiing, and having her tonsils out. Maybe the secret of her indestructible body is that she sleeps like a baby for nine hours a night, no matter what, and can drift off to dreamland in two minutes, sitting, standing, or riding a roller coaster, if she wants to. "What really relaxes me is excitement and work," swears Terry.

IF THAT's true, then from now on Terry Moore should remain as pleasantly limp as a possum. Because, with the new deal in sex appeal that she's handed Hollywood, Terry Moore could be quintuplets and still not meet the demand. And, I'm pretty sure, that would be just dandy with her.

After getting her name on the dotted line at 20th Century-Fox, Darryl Zanuck's talent chief, Lew Schreiber, called Terry at home. "We want to make you welcome here and we want to make you happy," he said. "What can we do?"

"Keep me busy," replied Terry. That would be easy, promised Schreiber.

"You see," explained Terry Moore, "my Mormon grandpa has a saying: 'It's better to wear out than to rust out.'"

At this point, the chances of slow oxidation setting in on Terry Moore seem fairly remote—say—about 10,000,000-to-1. As for needing new parts or replacements—for either her engine or chassis—why, she's just getting warmed up and broken in! END

"I know a lot of little things about myself . . . I love the classics, hate large corsages, crave for an enormous bathroom, and eat geranium leaves . . ." candidly confesses Diana Lynn in this twelfth article in the MODERN SCREEN personality plus series.

Take my word for it

by DIANA LYNN, star columnist for April

I can help myself; and often do.

Keep friends, don't influence 'em.

I should wear my glasses more often.

Lobsters or eels; I'll eat anything.

FRIENDS . . . what attracts them, what keeps them, what loses them? They say that of a half-dozen good friends a person may have at any given time, only three will remain close friends at the end of a five-year period. That goes pretty well for me. People change. But when I meet an old friend I haven't seen for ages and she cries, "My, but you've changed!" it's always a tense few seconds for me until I hear which way!

You may know someone who is in the process of changing. If you catch her at such a time and like her well enough you'll understand what's going on and give her an opportunity to get to be whatever she is on her way to be . . . without undue criticism. The "in between" periods are sometimes bad periods. The old friend I like to meet is the one who will say, "My, Diana! You've become more glamorous!" Only I don't think I'm glamorous anyway (It's raining today).

My perpetual worry is that my friends will think I'm a snob because I won't say "Hello" when we pass. Often, without my glasses on, I can't recognize them. I use my glasses when driving but never when walking. I can walk without them . . . but I don't always know whom I'm passing (or passing up!).

THE THING I MISS MOST in California are peonies; they just don't grow out here, or at least not where I can ever see them. The thing I miss most on the road is a home. I hate hotel rooms no matter how beautifully decorated and that is why I always rent a house or an apartment if I am making an extended stay in any city. I need the warmth of a home feeling. I'm looking forward to decorating a new apartment now. I'm going to use cheerful colors; I'm depending on having a fireplace. I'm not thinking of a big place. I believe the days of the lavish movie star are gone forever. It is much better to be well off at 50 than to have seven minks now. Yet . . . I dream always of an enormous bathroom with wall to wall carpeting, shelves by the tub for cosmetics and a tray to make reading possible. (If Marlon Brando wants to live in a cold water flat that's okay with me).

Coming back to flowers I used to eat leaves before they called it chlorophyll. I recommend geranium leaves; very tasty. And I think the French are right about the parsley chefs put on your plates; the French don't consider it just a decoration—they eat it. I am, and have always been since I can remember, an ice eater. Leaving the subject of flowers—I love yellow blooms, and also flowering fruit trees. Coming back to apartments—nobody ever said I was neat but every so often I go on a crazy cleaning binge, working over my closets and drawers until they are all practically sterile.

FOR LAST NEW YEAR'S my resolutions included being a better sport than I have been and a decision to laugh more. I'm not as shy as I used to be, for which I am grateful. I think I also should have decided to learn a new language. I wish I could speak at least three languages. The one I am writing in is the only one I get around in. When I was in Mexico for my latest picture, Plunder Of The Sun, I took Spanish lessons every day. I sounded fine to those who knew no Spanish at all. Which reminds me . . . I wish Americans wouldn't complain so much when they are abroad. They expect all people to speak English and seem to refuse to learn foreign languages themselves because they are afraid of making fools of themselves. Actually it is amazing how much the Mexicans enjoyed my attempts to speak Spanish, despite all my mistakes, just because I showed interest enough in their tongue to try. And about Mexican food; if it isn't what it should be according to American standards there is still no point on harping on it in front of the Mexicans. Some Americans with us complained so steadily in front of a charming Mexican couple I knew that it became simply maddening.

My only peeve about Mexico was the fact that guests never arrived at parties until two and a half hours after the announced time. No wonder most hostesses feel like Stella Dallas at the birthday party she gave to which nobody came at all.

I DIDN'T MAKE ANY RESOLUTIONS about my coffee drinking but I do drink too much—perhaps 9 cups a day sometimes. I also am not going to do anything about changing my name, though I don't like it. Diana Lynn was chosen for me when I started my career. It's too late to alter it now. My own last name was Loehr which they thought too hard to spell. Still I'm glad my friends don't call me Dolly any more. I think Ava Gardner is a wonderful theatrical name (and I think Ava is getting to be a better actress all the time, plus I wish I looked like her). I think Ann Blyth and Julie Harris are wonderful names (and Julie just about the most wonderful actress I've ever seen).

Take my word for it

I HAVE HAD AN INDIRECT BENEFIT for which I shall always be deeply grateful. I never realized when I studied piano that learning to memorize all the notes in a repertoire of numbers was excellent training for memorizing dialogue. It has been an invaluable aid in my theatrical work, and, of course, in TV plays. I don't see how any actor can use a teleprompter (the device which enables him to read his lines) and act out a scene properly at the same time. For me, a one hour dramatic show means a week to ten days of work, spending ten hours each day at it, learning my lines and how to play my part. On the first day I go over the play with the director while he blocks out the scenes (giving me an idea where I stand and how I'll move about), by the second day I am well into committing the lines to memory and by the third day I have them letter-perfect... the lines, I mean, nothing else. Now comes the important thing—studying my role for what it means, for the character involved, for the drama possible, or, in other words, the playing of the part. I think I have played the two longest parts in the legitimate theatre as the heroines in Voice Of The Turtle and also The Moon Is Blue. I learned them at the rate of three or four days to each act, going back often for review and refreshers. I always work with someone so that they can cue me (I lose a lot of friends this way) and always work on my feet, pacing about.

Luckily I never remember what I don't need. All the parts I have learned in my life aren't topside in my head ready to come to my tongue (how awful that would be!) but they are there. I couldn't play Voice Of The Turtle tonight, but if I had to I could probably be up on the part by tomorrow night. I learn fast and I think it is like this for all actors who learn fast—they forget fast. People who are slow studies retain longer.

I ALWAYS WANTED to go into the theater because I was curious to learn if I could endure doing the same role every night. I found it wonderful, instead of a bore. I was in The Moon Is Blue for 14 weeks and instead of its getting monotonous. I found myself still working at my part during the very last matinée.

There is this much to say for the legitimate theater—you do more acting and less of the extra stuff that goes with being an actor. In Hollywood there is so much time spent on activities incidental to your real work; the costume fitting, the testing, the posing for still, the publicity running around. I just hate to pose for stills. I like to look at stills of myself, but generally it is with mixed emotions. I'm just not a raving beauty, I guess.

The girl in Hollywood who has managed herself the best, in my estimation, is Jeanne Craine. A home, husband and four children plus a fine career! That's being a person as well as an actress. A deep curtsy to her!

I WONDER IF WE LIKE FOREIGN PICTURES so much (when we do like them, I mean) because we don't know the actors or actresses in the cast and therefore can accept them in their parts? I wonder, too, if this has anything to do with the fact that I am crazy to go to Europe. (Anybody need a continental-adventuress-type heroine?) Me going to Europe! Why! I've never even been in a drive-in movie! Or does that make sense? I also don't like Westerns but I must be wrong (Anybody need a Western heroine?) This reminds me of Texas. I wish that Texans wouldn't be so... but, what's the use, they always will be! If I did go to Europe I probably would go in for exotic dishes. I think they are fun. I've had eels, fried grasshoppers (in Mexico) and snails (in San Francisco). Same girl likes cookies late at night and often has a terrible craving for peanut butter. I guess my eating schedule is fixed for life—nothing much until dinner and then eat like a truck driver.

I KNOW A LOT OF LITTLE THINGS about myself but the smart person is one who knows the big things. Of the little things... much. I hate corsages; they stick out on you like Christmas packages. If I get one I carry it or pin it on my bag... I hate to be asked to play the piano at parties and I hate parties where every one puts on a show... I especially hate to see women in formal gowns when their escort is just in a business suit... I wish the new group of young male actors wouldn't wear their hair uncombed in front. I can't tell them apart, (No, I don't mean Rock Hudson's hair. I can't even see that far up!)... I deplore so much fuss about who is dating who? I sometimes feel more than one couple has stood in front of the preacher because they didn't want to make a liar out of some columnist... Twice a year I think of clothes from the buying viewpoint; the rest of the time I watch to see where they are going. Am I staying with them? Ahead? Or behind?... I wish I could stop picking at my fingernail polish.

EVEN THOUGH I AM AGAINST HELPLESSNESS in women—letting men light their cigarettes, open doors—I realize now that lots of men would have nothing else to do if they couldn't do that for you. If your man can't do anything more than this, hadn't you better throw him back in and try all over again? By the same token I don't think women should act as the disciples of the goddess of clothes and talk nothing else. I think a girl minimizes her chances to be liked, to be respected by those who count, if she is too (and too obviously) concerned about her adornment. It doesn't hurt a girl to round out her personality with general knowledge, for instance. I feel that every girl should amplify her school education by interest and work in some specialty she finds interesting; if nothing else by reading, the good books, the classics. I would have had a much more difficult time, perhaps been in a bad spot, if I had depended just on my school work to prepare me for meeting the world. The people and the situations I met in literature helped me meet the people and situations I ran across in my everyday life. Don't stumble. Walk in the light.

This reminds me, I must do my good deed for the day. Even if it is only to call someone I know is alone.

(Continued from page 54) money troubles. No bitter jealousies, private or professional. No in-law hostility. No alcoholic problem or other degrading habits. No incapacitating illness, nervous breakdowns, or disagreements over their child. No skeletons in closets or hidden scandals.

Yet for every dead marriage there is an obituary. Back of every breakup there is a story. And there is a story behind the separation of Anne Baxter and John Hodiak, too. It does not begin in Hollywood, where they met, fell in love, married and lived together for half-a-dozen years of their lives. It begins properly in two other places:—Hamtramck, Michigan, an industrial suburb of Detroit, sometimes called "the toughest town in the U.S.A.", where John Hodiak grew up; and Bronxville, New York, capital of the wealthy Westchester County society and country-club set, Anne Baxter's home town, where her family were prosperous and socially prominent.

If the story of the Baxter-Hodiak divorce were a flat case of irreconcilably different-side-of-the-tracks backgrounds, it would be simple. However, their "basic incompatibility" which became unbearable to both, is more complex. It stems not so much from what John and Anne were, but from what both became in their struggle to break away.

John Hodiak didn't want to work in a factory. Anne Baxter refused to vegetate into a proper but dull Ivy and Junior League future. Both wanted something bigger and more important out of life.

Both fought to be something different from what their natural beginnings predicted. Their struggles were completely different, but equally hard. In both cases they created tense and intense, chronically discontented, ambitious, incorrigible personalities who could not bend to another's will or compromise, no matter how much they wanted to or tried.

In marriage, wherever it thrives, someone has to give in. Someone must dominate; someone carry the ball. For too long both Anne Baxter and John Hodiak had paddled their own canoes—and against the current. When they teamed up there was no way they could relax and glide along together. And that is the peculiar tragedy of their marriage.

It was back in 1944, in a picture called Sunday Dinner For A Soldier, that Anne Baxter first met John Hodiak. Anne played

I SAW IT HAPPEN

The other day my girlfriend and I were going down to the beach at Santa Monica and while driving along San Vicente Drive, a Pontiac came alongside of us. There were two young men in it. We were admiring the color of the car, when the driver looked up and smiled.

Then he winked and gave us a hearty, "Good morning, girls."

We acknowledged his greeting and then he drove on. Each time we passed him or he passed us, he would smile and wave.

It was Scott Brady.

"Tess" and John "Eric" and the script said they were to fall in love. The minute Anne stepped into love scenes with the tall, handsome stranger she knew she wasn't just acting. She remembers experiencing, "an intense physical attraction," so intense that, despite her already polished acting finesse she couldn't connect for kisses and flubbed several scenes.

At that point Anne Baxter was 21. She was already recognized as a brilliant young actress. Privately, too, in many ways, she was experienced and sophisticated far beyond her years; but regarding men she was naive, and romantically she was immature.

Anne Baxter had been a lonely, only child. She was a girl who never had fitted into a group, who preferred the friends of her parents to kids her own age, a girl who spent her adolescent years learning how to act instead of collecting wisdom about the opposite sex, which, underneath everything, is the normal pursuit of a teen-age girl.

As her family moved around, Anne attended a grand total of 15 schools. In each she remembers, "feeling like a stranger." She never belonged. Throughout her early girlhood Anne lived in a world of make-believe where romance was concerned. At 11 she put the make-believe to practice and started dramatic lessons in New York City. This drew her farther apart from the normally carefree girls and boys at school, interested, not in dreams of dramatic glory—but in each other. "I never had a line," Anne has said. "I never knew any feminine wiles. I was a wallflower." At the junior cotillions she remembers spending most of the time in the powder room, because they weren't fun for her, only ordeals.

At 14, Anne Baxter was a juvenile hit on Broadway—and yet, while from then on she neither knew nor cared about the Princeton and Yale football heroes her schoolmates chattered about, she was also too young to date the adult actors she met on the stage. Sometimes she developed wild crushes on leading men twice her age. But always her dad picked her up at the stage door and so she went home, instead of to a night club, after the show.

Even when she came to Hollywood at 17 to begin her $350 a week screen career with John Barrymore in The Great Profile, Anne either lived with her mother, or was entrusted to chaperones and family friends, from whose watchful eyes she could only infrequently escape.

This then, was the girl who—for the first time in her life—fell in love, head over high heels, with handsome John Hodiak—but didn't know what to do about it. Because at first, off-camera, John acted as if Anne didn't exist. He walked straight from their love scenes to his dressing room, as if, she has since said, "he was trying to run away," which, in effect, John Hodiak was. There was a reason for this, too.

At 30, John Hodiak was a confirmed bachelor and something of a woman hater. He had avoided serious romantic entanglements like the plague. They didn't fit into his fierce resolve to make something of himself.

At first, John had wanted to be a Catholic priest, then a big league baseball player.

But, driving executives and important visitors around the Chevrolet plant in a summer job, he'd had a look at another more affluent, exciting world and liked what he saw. He wanted to talk and act and dress and live like successful people. He knew he had talent, although he knew it was raw. When he scored on an amateur radio contest and resolved that radio should be his open sesame to success, the pros only scoffed, "A guy who talks as tough as you do, Bud, will never make it in a million years!" But John had made it. He'd looked, listened, studied, worked, improved and grabbed every chance that came along to pull himself up. He'd done it all by himself. He still shied away from any help—or any hindrance.

Anne Baxter has always been frank in admitting that she courted John Hodiak instead of the usual other way around. But at first she found it, "hard to get through to him." Nothing seemed to work. Finally she asked John to take her to a cocktail party which Director Lloyd Bacon was giving. It was a strange first date.

He was supposed to call for Anne at 6 o'clock. He finally arrived at 11, in company with his agent, Dick Steenberg, an old boy friend of Anne's. They had already been to another cocktail party and were feeling no pain. Not only had John ignored his date with Anne, he hadn't bothered to telephone. Now, the gay blades wanted nightcaps. Anne gave them several then, pretty put out with developments, went on upstairs to bed. Next morning she found her callers still snoozing away on her living room divans. Restoring them with breakfast and a dip in her pool, she told them goodbye, not thinking she'd ever see John Hodiak again and telling herself that she didn't really care. But the next evening they were back, with flowers and apologies, and lugging, as a gag, suitcases. They took her to dinner and again slept on her sofas.

His wariness banished by Anne's good sportsmanship, John Hodiak let down his guard and fell in love. That was in August. In November he proposed. But it was two long years before John and Anne could make up their minds to get married.

THEIR engagement was heckled by doubt, indecision and other frustrating factors. John had brought his family out to California and he had responsibilities there. Anne's family thought the difference in backgrounds could only lead to unhappiness, also that two careers in one home were bound to clash. But a family friend has said, "With Mrs. Baxter it wasn't so much not wanting Anne to marry John Hodiak, but, at that point, any man." Anne's mother knew how self-willed, independent and dedicated to ambition her daughter was and had been all her life.

When Anne was only seven, her mother, at wit's end, had taken her defiant daughter to a psychiatrist, who told her, "You can't change her, so you might as well make peace." In a quarter century of happy married life, Catherine Baxter had learned that it is the wife who must be the peacemaker.

Oddly enough, Anne herself feared herself incapable of this. "I wanted to get married, but at the same time I was afraid," she has admitted. "I knew my own weakness for sudden changes and violent contrasts. I wasn't sure I'd be stable enough for marriage." Also, Anne had long sworn, "never to marry an actor," intelligently aware of two-career dangers. And so had John, besides blowing hot and then blowing cold toward the responsibilities of marriage, because of his own basic insecurity. So despite the fact that Anne and John were deeply in love it was an off-and-on affair until one climactic meeting when they both decided, "never to see each other again." And, at that moment they meant it.

Driving home from that dramatic break-off, Anne was so upset and blinded by tears that she smashed up her car. The news brought John hurrying over to Anne's arms and they decided to marry at once, family opposition or not. Like good sports and good parents, the Baxters sensibly agreed, and Anne Baxter became Mrs. John Hodiak in her mother's garden at Burlingame, California, on July 7, 1946.

On the face of their future John and Anne Hodiak started married life with no apparent problems. John was nine years older than Anne, true, but that, as most matrimonial experts agree, is the ideal age difference. Both were young and healthy. They had a house all ready to move into—all furnished, all apple-pie. They had a ready made circle of friends and a social calendar dated weeks ahead. They had two incomes, both sizable. As for careers—John had just scored a hit in A Bell For Adano, and Anne had just finished the meatiest role of her life in The Razor's Edge, which soon won her an Oscar. In fact, both the Hodiak family careers have rolled along successfully right up to the end. But career success doesn't ensure happiness. The occupational hazards to happiness for two actors wedded in Hollywood are notorious. Most of these familiar strikes Anne and John soon had chalked up against them.

Probably the severest handicap for these two who especially needed close companionship were their separations throughout much of their married life. John went to England to make a picture, Anne stayed in Hollywood. When he came back, she went off to repeated and long locations. Then John went to New York for the stage.

WHEN she was married, Anne resolved to build, "a wall around our private lives and intimate affairs," which she worked surprisingly well in a goldfish-bowl community. Although their marriage has been heading for disaster for almost two years, it was only lately that even their closest friends, let alone columnists, suspected the true state of affairs. When she was carrying her baby, Katrina, Anne made Follow The Sun without even her studio knowing and kept the stork tidings away from the sharpest-eyed reporters until three months before her delivery. Both John and Anne can hold their tongues.

But back of that "wall," the natural state of tension, which exists wherever two actors live, are heightened by the high-strung, mercurial natures of both partners in the Hodiak home. Not even her most devoted admirers would call Anne Baxter a restful, soothing person to be around. "I can get physically exhausted just watching Annie," a close friend says. "She never walks—she runs; she doesn't talk—she lectures." Another has described her thus, "Anne's mind is sober, but her body's always drunk." Anne herself says, "I was born breathless and I'm still that way."

Anne has to dramatize everything that happens to her. One girl friend, who has had five babies, says, "When Anne talks about Katrina, I realize how little I know about motherhood." Not long ago, an elderly stranger observed her lunching at Romanoff's, walked over and told her, "Thank you. That's the best performance I've seen since the days of Ellen Terry!" Anne must have something happening to her constantly, something different. "Smorgasbord is my favorite meal," she admits. "Anne wants to play every instrument in the band," her mother sighs.

A frenetic, kinetic girl like that is delightful to know, but not necessarily easy to live with. But in his way John Hodiak is just as wound up. Only it stays inside. Where Anne is extroverted, John is intro-verted. Where she lets off steam, John stores it up. Rejected four times by the Army for hypertension, Hodiak is chronically taut and notoriously frowning, a worrier, still anxious and insecure despite his success. "John," a good friend told him not long ago, "you've got the best smile in Hollywood (which he has). Why in the world don't you use it more?"

"I just never think about it," he replied.

Two such highly-keyed and positive personalities are hard enough to blend into harmonious music of marriage, but there were a couple of other things more eternally grating to John's and Anne's happiness, and even more impossible to change. Because they stemmed back to the roots of both their beginnings and their very psyches. One was their contrasting ideas about the roles wives and husbands should play in a marriage. On this they started and remained poles apart until the end.

"John's idea of a wife was the European one," Anne had said. This is only natural. His mother was a European, a woman who devoted herself to her home, cooking the meals, housekeeping, raising the Hodiak kids. But Anne's mother lived differently. Mrs. Baxter was interested in all kinds of things besides her home, active in civic and charity affairs, a decorator, a student of the arts, a great many things besides a housewife. Like mother, like daughter.

John knew all this, but the ideas formed in his childhood were too strong to abandon. A husband is said to expect the image of his mother in his wife. What criticisms he made of Anne, what minor household clashes they had, were over the way she ran—or didn't run—things. She wasn't tidy, she wasn't orderly, she wasn't this or that. Once, John had even suggested that Anne give up her Hollywood career. He might as well have asked her to give up her life. Acting had been her consuming dream since she was three years old, and it still is. "I'll never settle for less than I dreamed about when I was a girl," Anne stated only recently. "That is to be the greatest actress in the world—with all that goes with it. Very probably I won't but I'll die trying!"

And that's the other thing—and the most impossible of all for Anne Baxter and John Hodiak to understand about each other—their different egos. Anne has a strong ego. So has John. All actors have—or they aren't good actors. But neither Anne Baxter nor John Hodiak—being inexperienced—understood the workings of the particular egos of the opposite sex and how to live with them, and satisfy them.

"I never wanted to change John," Anne puzzled the other day. "I only wanted to help him. But when I tried he resented it. I wanted to make John happy, but I was making him miserable. Maybe I tried too hard." Maybe she did. Maybe both of them did. Because both made mistakes, well intended, but mistakes just the same.

Take the house they came to from their honeymoon, and which John has just left for their divorce. It was Anne's house and it was a little gem of an English cottage, perched on a Hollywood hillside with a pool shimmering below, and a framed view of the city's lights. You couldn't have asked for a cozier spot for newlyweds. But John didn't like it—and from a masculine pride standpoint, understandably. It wasn't their house, to start their life. It housed memories of Anne's past life.

All by himself, he found another house in another part of town and impetuously put down $10,000, instead of the usual few hundred. But the house was found unsuitable and John lost his $10,000. After that fiasco, Anne and John talked it over and decided to stay where they were, but to change Anne's house all around so you wouldn't know it. This they certainly did. The place was changed from English to contemporary modern at a cost of $26,000. Every room in the place was switched around except the kitchen. At the end of that project, one of the most striking homes in Hollywood emerged—but it was never John's house; it was Anne's. An architect disciple of Frank Lloyd Wright, her grandfather, designed it. Her mother decorated it. It reflected Anne's tastes. Therefore, the project failed its purpose. It was John's home in name only.

Or take their friends. When John and Anne were married, John had no friends among the top Hollywood social set in which the Hodiaks soon travelled. He was a man's man, essentially. It was only natural that the clever, sophisticated and social people Anne knew—Watson Webb of the Vanderbilt clan, the Samuel Goldwyns, Clifton Webb, the Leonard Firestones, the Dore Scharys—should comprise their set. But in that circle of smart dinner parties and smart conversation, John did not shine, while Anne did. John learned to like Anne's friends and they, him. He wore the smart Brooks Brothers' clothes Anne was always presenting him with, drank the champagne she fancied.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

When I was overseas I saw Randolph Scott at a USO show. As soon as the show was over, he made a short, serious announcement. "Fellows," he said, "I lost my wallet! Whoever has it can keep the money, but please give me back the papers." Everyone was shocked, wondering who had stolen the wallet. Later, it was discovered that the wallet was in the seat of the staff car, where he had dropped it on the way over to the show.

Mr. Gabriel Chavez
San Diego, Calif.

"But," as an acquaintance suggests, "John still prefers beer."

EVEN though he did learn to enjoy much that his marriage with Anne Baxter brought him, a proud, independent, self-made man like John was bound subconsciously to resent them. Even, too, if the fact that his wife made twice the salary he commanded meant absolutely nothing at all in the family budget—both paid their share of a household fund and there was money enough always—still, to a man like John, that fact was insidiously disturbing. Perhaps Anne could be criticized—and sometimes was—for having her father handle her money, not John. But John Hodiak was no business man—as he proved—and Anne's father is an eminently successful one. There are a great many things perhaps—if she owned the wisdom of Cleopatra—which Anne could have done to play up to John Hodiak's masculine ego, and some he could have done to bolster her feminine one, too.

For an example, when Anne was pregnant with Katrina, the doctor ordered her to take long walks. Religiously, she was out on them every night. Always she asked John if he wouldn't like to go, too. Always he said "no," preferring to read or watch TV. This hurt and puzzled her. She felt she should be treated with special respect, be an object of special pride and delight to her husband.

But if John could be criticized for ignoring her need for special loving deference, Anne could too, for a well-meant thoughtlessness when Katrina arrived. Her first pains arriving at three A.M., she slipped out of bed without waking John, dressed and drove herself to the hospital alone. She didn't wake him because she knew he had an early studio call. But, if you ask me—studio call or not—John Hodiak would have wanted to be shaken wide awake at such a time or even welcomed a douse of ice water. It's something few first fathers want to miss.

Such psychological misunderstandings grew, as misunderstandings do, to distance, silence and coolness. John—as Anne puts it—"drew more and more into his shell." On both sides answers became more formal, humor dried up. It was almost two years ago when John went to New York to play on Broadway in The Chase, that Anne made the discovery which led to their divorce.

She flew back twice to see John. The second time he had just won the Donaldson Award, for the best male debut of the year on Broadway. Anne was thrilled and could hardly wait for the taxi to take her to John to congratulate him. But he greeted her impersonally, and with a frown. He had his apartment in Manhattan, his own friends, his play, his own life, at least temporarily, and Anne sensed that he liked it better that way. "For the first time," she says, "I realized that John was actually happier away from me than with me."

Back in Hollywood, they began their discussions on this very theme. They were long, honest and searching talks, and everything was brought out into the open. "We analyzed ourselves," Anne says, "and decided neither of us could change. If John changed he would be miserable. If I changed I would, too. We were both sick about it but there was no answer. We both agreed we couldn't help each other; we agreed we would be happier without each other. No one influenced us. No one knew. It was our decision, alone together. It was not easy to make."

The hardest part, of course, was their concern about their daughter, Katrina. Both John and Anne are adoring parents. Both are conscientious. "But," says Anne, "both John and I decided it was better for Katrina to grow up in a broken home than a cold one." John is free to come to Anne's home and see Katrina whenever he wants to, and already he has been there many times. In almost all divorce agreements there is a clause prohibiting the mother (Anne will have custody of Katrina) from taking the child out of the country. John pooh-poohed this. "It will be educational for Katrina to have a trip abroad," he said. "Take her whenever you like." Anne plans to do this soon, when she makes a picture in Europe.

If you ask Anne Baxter about her feelings for John Hodiak today she will tell you honestly, "I have a great admiration for John. I respect him. I still think he's a wonderful guy, and I always will." John has said practically the same thing about Anne.

Is there then a chance for reconciliation? "None whatever," says Anne. "It took us too long to decide this to have any doubts." Marriage again? Anne will only give a wry smile. "Perhaps. But right now it's the furthest from my thoughts."

So a chapter is closed for Anne Baxter and John Hodiak—and for them both a new life begins. It will not be a lonely or idle life in either case. Anne is 29, John 38. Both are fortunate to have a family around them. John's parents, his sister and brother too, live in the San Fernando Valley. Anne's are only an hour's plane ride away. They came down to spend Christmas with her and Katrina, after John left. Both John's and Anne's friends will remain their friends, it's pretty certain. They won't have to take sides; there are no sides to take. Already both John and Anne have gone about their own particular interests. John hopped right up to Pebble Beach for Bing Crosby's Golf Tournament after the separation. Anne flew east for a fling at New York and the Inauguration at Washington. Anne plans to live on in the house which was hers before their marriage. John has moved into an apartment with a friend.

Both are attractive and popular people. Already Hollywood hostesses are vying to snare John Hodiak for their parties, and almost every glamor girl in town is pulling her charms together and rolling her eyes his way. So far he hasn't seemed too interested in a rebound romance. Neither has Anne. At this writing neither has had a date—but that will come, as it should.

As for careers—after Battle Zone and Cochise—John's is rolling along better than ever. He has extensive radio and TV commitments. Anne has I Confess and The Blue Gardenia finished and another for Alfred Hitchcock to be filmed this summer in the South of France. Her desk is piled high with scripts to read, and her agent's with offers. Her salary is half again higher than it was when she left her Fox studio contract and began her sexy glamor campaign, still obviously going great guns. Paul Gregory is already building a road show around Anne—as a song and dance girl—to go out in the fall.

But despite a double rose-colored outlook in many ways, both Anne Baxter and John Hodiak are aware that now is no time to cheer. Any divorce is a tragedy. Theirs is, too. In Anne's and John's case it is moreover, an ironic tragedy. Seeking success, they became two hyperpositive people between whom the spark that fuses a marriage could not leap, was not attracted but repelled. Perhaps the irony is best contained in Anne's own somewhat wondering words: "For the first time in my life," she says, "I've been a failure." This is no easy statement for Anne.

For the first time in his life, John Hodiak, the boy who came from "the other side of the tracks" to conquer Hollywood, could say the same thing. END

(Continued from page 52) had experienced, seen and felt. And how it had made her think again about other things, like her own life and ideals and responsibilities.

Debbie embarked to bring Christmas to GI's in Korea on the 19th of December. In her particular unit were Walter Pidgeon, Keenan Wynn, Peggy King, Carleton Carpenter and Movita, all MGM players.

"It was so exciting," Debbie said, "I could hardly breathe." The plans called for an overnight stopover in Honolulu, and all of us were looking forward to it eagerly. Me, particularly, because I had never been there. We stood around on the landing strip for about half an hour while people took our pictures and we spoke on the radio, then we all got on board and settled back in our seats. The motors started and the plane lumbered out to the end of the runway. Then a man came through the door leading to the pilots' compartment. "There has been a slight change in plans," he said. "There is a storm on the Honolulu route, so we'll be making our first landing in Alaska."

Debbie halted for a moment, an expression of horror on her face.

"Imagine!" she said. "ALASKA! And me with summer clothes on. Well, you could have heard the groans in downtown Los Angeles. I thought for awhile there that some of the people were going to get off and go home. But they didn't. We just sat back in the seats and decided that we were going to Korea, that was the main thing, and how we got there didn't make much difference. But anyway it was a letdown."

"As the plane got into the air I looked down at the ballet slippers I was wearing. Everything else had been locked up in the baggage compartment. And I wondered how they'd make out as snowshoes."

"Sometime that night we landed at an air base in the state of Washington and we were all so tired from telling each other all the stories we knew and playing cards and singing all the songs we knew that we just sleep-walked into the barracks they provided for us and conked off."

"THE next morning still groggy and tired, we got back into the plane and headed North. The next thing I knew it was dark again and we were bouncing across a field at a small airport. I got out with the rest and I asked a soldier where we were. 'Kodiak,' he said. Where is Kodiak? I asked him. 'Not far from the North Pole, Ma'am,' he said. Me and the ballet slippers trudged off across a field to a hut and stepped inside where it was warm.

"It's a funny thing, but I hadn't been in the hut more than two minutes before I was glad that we'd come by way of Alaska. You'd have thought from the looks on the faces of the men there that Santa Claus had really come to town. They were men assigned to one of our bleakest military outposts, and out of the sky had come a plane load of movie stars. They walked around us like kids at a circus—and I just know some of them were glad they were up in the wild north that night, instead of some stuffy place like Miami.

"Well, we had a real good time that night. We put on a show, right off the cuff and the soldiers loved it. They opened up a bar and everyone toasted everyone and laughed and slapped backs and had a high time. We got a real laugh when a soldier handed me a glass, but Walter Pidgeon took it away. 'She's a minor,' he said. 'Also a midget.' And that's what they called me from that time on. The midget. But I didn't care.

"The farewells the next morning were kind of sad, even though we'd only known each other a short time. We got aboard the plane and headed north again.

"I guess it was about three hours out when one of the motors stopped—and the pilot came back and told us we'd have to go back to Alaska for repairs. Kodiak, he said was fogged in, so we were going to Anchorage.

"Actually, our troubles getting out of Alaska would fill a book. We landed at Anchorage, gave a couple impromptu shows to GI's who also thought they'd hit the Christmas jackpot, then took off for Tokyo again. The next stop, however, because of the broken engine, was just about as far north as you can get. I won't mention the name. The field was quite a distance from the barracks, so we had to take a bus. We gave a show there and started back to the air field. The bus ran into a snowdrift and couldn't get out. They sent for a tractor. The tractor pulled the bus out—then it got stuck—and the bus had to pull the tractor out. Then we got to the field and into the airplane, where the pilot discovered the brakes were frozen. They got a lot of boiling water and in about an hour unfroze the brakes—and, 'way behind schedule, we took off once more for Tokyo. Maybe some of the gripes were because of these setbacks, but I thought it was all fun.

"It was exciting, but I hope I never again almost not make a place as nearly as we almost didn't make Tokyo. We had to land because we were out of gas just 25 miles from our destination. That was because of head winds. But anyway we gassed up and in a few minutes landed outside the capital of Japan.

"I'd never even imagined Japan was as colorful as it is. We were billeted at the Imperial Hotel, and spent most of our time being briefed by officers who told us about security measures and other things important to our visit to the front lines. Then we were taken to a WAC station where we were given our Korean 'gear.' Gear, my eye! I got a pair of size seven shoes—and I wear four. I have a 20-inch waist, and the closest they could come to fitting me in a pair of GI pants was 27. When I put the outfit on and started outside I looked like I was walking in a hole. Fortunately we had made up our minds that we would wear ski suits, so we put the army duds on over the ski clothes and headed for Korea.

"No place, not even Alaska, is as cold as Korea in the winter. To keep warm I wore two suits of long underwear, the ski outfit, the army uniform and an overcoat. And I was still cold. We were assigned to a hut, the other girls and myself, that was part tent, and breezy, but we were where we set out to be so we didn't mind. We were lucky at that, because we had a small pot-bellied stove on which we could heat water and wash out our things and take sponge baths. I felt, maybe for the first time in my life, that I was going through an experience that was really good for me, and that I was doing something that would help somebody else. It was worth all the troubles we had gone through to get there.

"We were to work out of the Tenth Corps, so a schedule was set up, one that would make it possible to play for as many soldiers as possible. There was just one restriction. We were not permitted to visit posts within range of enemy shell fire. But we got close enough to hear them coming in and landing just beyond the hills ahead.

"Last Christmas is one I'll never forget. We spent Christmas Eve in Seoul. Motiva, Peggy King, Carolina Cotten, a girl named June Brunner and I stayed at a girls' school, and we gave a couple of shows to the soldiers stationed there. Then, bright and early on Christmas morning, we were flown to the front. All of our troupe gathered together in a pre-fab hut and had Christmas breakfast. I had brought along one of those cardboard Christmas trees that fold up, and I put it up and placed presents for everyone around it. Just silly presents. For instance, I gave Walter and Keenan paddle balls. We sang a couple of carols together and I guess we were all a little dewey-eyed that morning, thinking of home. And then we started the rounds of the forward outposts.

"The cold be damned. Every one of us girls put on short skirts, high heels and sweaters. And everywhere we went you'd have thought we were the first girls those poor guys had ever seen. And never as long as any of us live will we forget the receptions. At every place the men had built stages, sometimes outside, sometimes in tents or pre-fabs, but there was always a stage and a decorated Christmas tree in our honor. If it hadn't been for the guns in the distance you'd never have thought there was a war anywhere.

"We hopped from camp to camp in jeeps and small airplanes that shuttled us in twos over the mountains to the next show place. We danced ourselves stiff and sang ourselves hoarse. And Keenan did every comedy routine he knew. They loved Walter particularly. He was travelling about in a top coat and Homburg hat, but he'd take them off when we got to a stage and was funnier than Milton Berle. We travelled and worked and wore ourselves out, but there never was such a Christmas—and never in my life have I been happier.

"It was especially wonderful for me. It seemed that everywhere I turned I met boys I had known at home, many I had gone to school with, and if you think they were glad to see me, it was not half as much joy for them as it was for me to see them and take down messages to carry home to their families.

"When I went to bed after that busy day, I tried to think that I had been in a small way responsible for letting those fellows there in the dread winter of a foreign land know that the people at home had not forgotten them. I thanked God for the chance He had given me that winter of 1952.

"When we got back to Tokyo, our work done, most of us were ill from exposure. Keenan and Peggy King had the worst colds and both had ear infections that made it dangerous for them to fly. So I stayed on in Tokyo with them until we were all able to come back together.

"Now that I'm back here, back at work at the studio, with a sun outside and a comfortable dressing room and my family to go to at night, I wonder if everything I used to think was worthwhile is really so. When I go to work in the morning, I wonder if it's what I should be doing. Sometimes I think I'd like to go back to school and then start all over again—and I wonder if I'd go into the movies. Maybe I'd be a teacher."

It is a perfectly natural thing, we suppose, for a girl like Debbie Reynolds to feel the way she does after the experience she has been through. And even though the story of her Christmas trip to bring short skirts, high heels and sweaters and singing and dancing to soldiers overseas is a bit dated now that spring is upon us, we feel somehow that the recounting of it and what she felt is the best way to know her. She has other facets than the one shown in that tale, to be sure, but actually, from what she says now, most of the principles that guide her life now have been strengthened by her adventure at Christmas.

"I have no intention of getting married," she said. "I like a lot of boys in Burbank and in Hollywood, but none of them enough to marry them. People link my name with Robert Wagner in the movie magazines. I don't mind that, but I'm not in love with Bob, nor is he in love with me. Ever since I have been in pictures I have tried not to lose track of Debbie Reynolds of Burbank, so I date as many boys in my home town as I do in the movie business. I like Carleton Carpenter. We have a real ball together when we date. But I like Burbank boys you never heard of just as much.

"Maybe the reason I get my name linked with the movie actors I know is because I have to go out with them on special occasions, like movie parties and premieres. I tried going out with some of the fellows around here on dates like that and it was torture for them. The minute somebody recognizes me and they start to take pictures and ask me for autographs, these guys get all panicky and squirm and try to run away. If I go to these affairs with Bob or Carleton, they don't mind. They are used to them and know it is all part of the movie game.

"If you really want to see me having fun, you'll have to go to the bowling alley near my house, or to the ice cream parlor

"And another thing that bothers me about Hollywood," Debbie said, "is the way romance is kicked around. They even kick love around. Not the actors, actually, but the press. They take it so lightly that it scares me. I don't ever want anything like that to happen to me. My mother and father have been married for more than 25 years. And when I really fall in love I want it to last as long as I live—and I don't want to read about it in the papers every time we speak a harsh word to one another. And when I get married, it will be forever.
When I say 'till death do us part,' that's what I'm going to mean.

"It's a funny thing," Debbie said, "but I sometimes wish I had never gotten into the movies. Maybe it would have been better."

AFTER three years in the movies, Debbie Reynolds has changed considerably, both in her attitude toward making movies and in her capabilities. At first she thought the whole business was something of a racket, a way for a girl to pick up a little money before they got wise. The fact that this was her opinion is borne out by the fact that when Warner Brothers put her on lay-off close to Christmas time she horrified everyone at the studio by taking a job selling hardware in a Valley dime store.
Debbie didn't know what the fuss was all about. She did both jobs just for the money.

When she first got into the movies she couldn't act, so she did the next best thing, she acted herself. She couldn't dance, but she took a few lessons and tried. If you saw her in Singing In The Rain you know she did all right by herself. She couldn't sing, but before anyone was aware of it she, teamed with Carleton Carpenter, had a hit record on the market that sold close to a million copies. That was Abba Dabba Honeymoon. And when the record was at its peak of popularity she made the rounds of the disk jockeys, at the request of the publicity department, and astonished all of them with her knowledge of singing and music.

Today, however, Debbie Reynolds is vitaly interested in her work. And she's a serious-minded student of a craft she once joked about. She used to flit about the MGM lot in her early days looking for pranks to play or interesting places to loaf. Now she toils like a Barrymore. And when one of the various coaches at the studio takes visitors around the lot, they generally stop at the stage where Debbie is working and introduce her as their prize pupil.

Some weeks ago there was a casting conference going on at MGM. The executives were plotting the player lists for the announcement of the coming season's product. One by one the films to be made were discussed and cast, tentatively, of course, but with the stars and actresses who seemed right for the parts. Soon the job was done and the men wearily put down their papers. Suddenly, though, one of them took another glance at the completed lists.

"Say," he said, "has any star ever made nine pictures in a year on this lot?"

"Of course not," his co-workers chorused.
"Then," said the first man, "we've got to start all over again. That's how many parts we've got Debbie Reynolds committed to here."

They groaned and went back to work.
"The trouble with that girl is," one man groused, "that she can play anything."

Debbie Reynolds, then, in three short years has taken a solid hold on stardom.
She is considered a top attraction, and the fan mail backs this up. She is thought to be a real bet as a singing star, and Gene Kelly himself says she's as good a dancer as he ever hopes to work with as either a hooper or director. And before many seasons have passed the studio expects Debbie will walk away with some big honor for her acting. That is Debbie Reynolds in her career life.

PERSONALLY, however, you'd never know she was a "Big Shot." There is in Debbie Reynolds a sweetness that is not at all sticky. There is a cleaving to old-fashioned habits of proper living that is seen not too often in the younger generation today, and very seldom in youngsters in the public eye. But she will stick to them, you can wager on that.

We saw Debbie Reynolds going to a party a few months ago and it was something that gave us food for thought. There was a long line of cars slowly creeping up the driveway of a Beverly Hills mansion, and a corps of men at the top of the drive opening doors and parking the cars for the guests. There was quite a bit of space in the street in front of the home, but no Hollywood personality worth his salt will park his own car at a time like that.

We were in the line of cars when we saw a battered, but neat, convertible slide into a space at the curb. Then a young man, looking fiercely uncomfortable in a tuxedo got out and walked to the other side to let his date out. They walked to the gates of the house, looked at the mad mob in the driveway, and then the girl took off a fancy pair of satin evening shoes, and, holding her gown up out of the tall grass of the lawn, began a half-acre walk to the house.

We drove up like the rest of the folks and then, out of curiosity, walked around to the side of the building where the boy and girl had disappeared. They stood outside a huge window peering in at the throngs of beautiful women and handsome men standing about the room. The boy looked scared to death. The girl was Debbie Reynolds, and she, too, looked at what was going on in awe, her dress still held up and her slippers in her hand.

That, we thought, as we went inside, is the way to go to a Hollywood party. It's more fun to watch than to attend. We went about our business shaking hands with famous people and chatting idly with celebrities. We never saw Debbie inside.
Maybe she and her date just stayed outside and, after they'd seen enough, went to a quieter place that might be more fun.
If she did, it was typical of her. She's not Hollywood at all. Not Debbie. END

I SAW IT HAPPEN

When one of the night clubs on the Strip had an opening recently, fans gathered outside to take snapshots of the stars as they arrived.
When Joan Crawford appeared, it seemed as if everyone wanted

a picture of her, because all at once the flashes began to go off. But there was one fan who couldn't get her camera to work. Miss Crawford noticed and went over to help her. The star, in her beautiful evening gown, took the flashbulb, bent down, and scraped the bulb along the concrete sidewalk.
Then she gave the bulb back to the fan, and told her to try it again. This time it worked perfectly, and Joan, as she left, told the grateful fan: "I hope the picture turns out nicely."

prayer and laughter

(Continued from page 67) What did people say God did? He lightened their souls. What did I do? I helped them touch happiness. Wasn't that the same? Surely it was close to being the same. I felt good. In hunger, on my hard bed, shivering in thin clothes, I could still feel good. And sometimes I'd think, "Well, God, we're partners." It was a good thought. You will smile at this but it was such a good thought that I still have it. I still think I am a partner of God. Only now I know I am not His only partner. I think He has a partner in everyone who walks on earth; some are active and contribute their interest and their energy; some are just silent partners—but none can take His name off the door.

You know, a child's world is small and everything narrows down with it. When I first met God He was doing a small business—just taking care of the Catholics. This was because I was a Catholic and didn't give Him much thought until I was taken to make my first communion. But soon afterwards, when I went out into the world (and I started leaving home on my own during summer vacations before I was 14), I saw that He was organized on a much wider scale.

It became apparent to me that God was associated with the Protestants, with the Jews, and, as I began to suspect, with anyone else who had the free will given to all humans to either love or hate their fellowmen. I had to think this because all kinds of people helped or hindered me, and I had to believe through experience that you couldn't tell which they were going to do by the labels on the outside. A Catholic was not necessarily a kind person; a Protestant not necessarily a devil; a Jew not necessarily a stranger. Today I think this was not only the greatest lesson I ever learned, but the one the whole world is painfully coming to learn. Prejudice is based on labels; wipe out the labels and you wipe out prejudice.

Or—pin them all onto yourself. If God is everything then we are everything. In one of my pockets I carry a crucifix, in the other a Hebrew mezuzah. I am a 32nd degree Mason.

MAYBE I can recall how I got started into thinking this way. It began, I believe, when I was still a child and after my communion. While the first church I knew about was, of course, a Catholic one, the second was a Lutheran one. It was here I had to go to attend the services for the soul of my Aunt Carrie when she died from erysipelas, an infection developing from a cut she suffered while picking tomatoes. We had to do a lot of picking in our family to live; tomatoes, coal off the railroad tracks, firewood off construction sites, the last crumb off the plate. . . .

I loved Aunt Carrie. As I sat in the pew that afternoon, filled with the combination of mysticism and dread that can grip a kid in the presence of death, I was worried. What would happen to Aunt Carrie, lying in her casket in this church, when God was over by the other one? How would she ever get to Him? How would He know where she was? I was much too perturbed about this to listen to the preacher's prayer and eulogy. But I knew when he had finished. As we said, "Amen," a shaft of sunlight shot down through one of the high, stained-glass windows. It fell on the coffin, bathing it in a whole pattern of dancing, gleaming colors. I knew then that He had! He had found Aunt Carrie. Good old God—you couldn't fool Him by putting different names on your churches!

I don't want to give anyone the impression that I must have been one of those queer youngsters, the poetic, angelic kind, bless them, who walk around with faraway looks in their eyes. I was more the scrubby, sharp-eyed, hustler type . . . with an open mind about life and the things you sometimes have to do to keep living it. To tell the truth I hung around the pool room a lot more than I did the church. A lot of the honest dollars I earned those days I earned working for dishonest men. I mean I worked hard for my money when I entertained for pitchmen, but they were getting the money to pay me by fooling the public with their fake medicine or wares. And some of my dollars I earned in even more questionable ways . . . meaning I was directly at fault.

I didn't worry about it at first. I wasn't even conscious of doing wrong, or at least wouldn't even dream of taking off time to go into the question. That came later. Nor did I reform immediately when I did realize it. That too, the development of first, conscience, and then character to follow conscience, took time and had to come later. But it came, over a long period of troubled moods, of realizations that I had hurt or wronged someone, of truths that persisted in telling themselves to me when I would much rather not hear about them.

I NEVER knew my father—and this is one of the saddest statements I ever have to make. He died before I was born. But some of the earliest words I can recall were about him, that he had been a great comedian, a clown with the Hagenback-Wallace Circus; and from the start there was fired in me an ambition to follow in his footsteps. At least I cannot remember ever wanting to be anything else but a fellow who can bring laughs into the world. I started entertaining when I was five years old, entertaining visiting relatives for whom I would drape an American flag around myself and orate like a preacher. Later, out in the street, and substituting a minstrel costume for the flag, I tried out the same act for strangers on a stage I had figured out for myself—the doorways of empty stores.

I used to do and sell card tricks. In return for running errands for card players in the pool room they would give me their old decks. Using glue, knife and scissors, I would convert these into magic decks and then demonstrate them on my stage. Then came the selling pitch—a quarter a deck. In order to work up a crowd I had to entertain in many ways; singing, playing a uke, telling jokes. My mother made me a black wig out of pieces of a worn, caracul coat, and helped me put together a bright minstrel jacket. I would "black-up" in the washroom of the nearest filling station and be all ready to go on. My only worry was hecklers—kids of my own age. And, of course, I didn't get anywhere trying to squash them with wise cracks. I had to get out there and fight. Yes, sir, you saw everything when you came to my show.

When I could get a regular job, back in those days in Vincennes, Indiana, I took it. One of my jobs was working for the J. C. Penny company breaking up packing cases and lugging the wood up into the alley to be carted away. But when a chance came to join a show on the road, a minstrel outfit, a stock company, or even a high or low pitchman, away I'd go. The reasons I'd give my mother were always the same: Some day I was going to be the greatest comedian in the world; some day I was going to take her to a warmer climate; some day I was going to die a millionaire. Well, I have brought her out to California and if you don't check the thermometer too closely maybe I have come through with that pledge. About my comedy... when she talks about it she says I'm coming right along. About the million... well, I meant it, but I'm not in such a hurry.

I got out of going to school awfully early I'm afraid, but it was no great loss in any case. All I ever did in school was sit and dream about show business anyway. And life was getting ready to tumble me around and pound sense into me... even if it wasn't in a classroom. I was going to slide into a lot of easy ways of getting along, and then I was going to be clunked.

In Peoria, Illinois, one fine day, my pitchman boss promised the audience sets of silverware with darn near every bottle of his elixir (made up of burnt sugar and epsom salts in water) they bought. Then he ducked out leaving me holding the bag—or stage. When the crowd caught wise and turned on me, my joke telling suddenly ended in a face-full of tears. Only these tears, and my youth, saved me from a bad time.

Another time, at the age of about 14, I found myself without funds, and in Valparaiso, Indiana, instead of Vincennes where I had a mother and a home. Whereupon I got mixed up in as weird a scheme as you could find this side of grave-robbing—and not very far this side of it either.
